instant of time.

Anthony had said nothing articulate, and he continued mute.

Miss Nugent, not without tremors, awaited a development of some sort.

None following, she continued:

"Twas a little hasty of them, to be sure; but—well, 'tis done now, and you'll not take it unkindly, Anthony, I hope."

"Faith! I'm thinking it's no great matter which way I take it," said Anthony with a dramatic humility.

"Of course it matters everything in the world," returned his sister warmly. "Isn't it you that will be providing for them?"

"Oh, as for providing, if that's what you'd have me be at, there's room enough and food enough for them here."

"Now, Anthony, I declare, 'tis absurd for you to be talking that way. Sure, how would they live here?"

Isn't it good enough for them? Is that what ye mean? Well, then, there's Sarah's place—what this 'tis called?" said the exasperating old man. "Doyne, I mean. Isn't that what she call it? Wouldn't Doyne be a sweet place for them? Or they might be coming and going, maybe, between the two—a month here and a month over there beyant. But will ye tell me, what's Sarah herself going to say to this little frolic of theirs?"

"She was with them when they were maaried."

"She was with them when they were maaried."

"Was she, now? 'Tis a great Sarah, and no mistake! Well, she'll not be hard on them anyway. She'll be building a new wing for them over there before we know what she's at."

"Deed, and she won't, for ye know very well, Anthony, that she couldn't afford it.
Now, there's Gravelmount, Anthony, of these days. What's inducing you that you can't do it now?"

"I never said a word about getting Gravelmount, upon me honor."

"But you meant to do it, now, didn't you?"

"Deed, I don't know that I'd say that either. I say what I said just now, that there's a power of room for them here. Let them come here if they like, and welcome. Kitty's a nice bright thing to have you say the first relief she got, and before one bottle come. Kitty's a nice bright thing to have "But you meant to do it, now, dian't you?"
"Deed, I don't know that I'd say that either. I say what I said just now, that there's a power of room for them here. Let them come here if they like, and welcome. Kitty's a nice bright thing to have about a house. I wouldn't object to her at all; no, not a bit in the world."

This attitude, which Anthony had assumed on the impulse of the moment, chiefly because he did not know what other to take up, he resolutely maintained, both with Barbara and Lady Frayne.

He was very seldom at the trouble of ex-

"Well, only as far as we are concerned," answered Barbara; "that's to say, Lady Frayne was with them. But wait, I'll read you his letter."

"'My dearest of aunts, hasn't he a sweet way with him?—'you will think we have treated you with dreadful shabbiness, but we really did it for your own good'—you see he can think of me through it all—'we both wanted to tell you about it as soon as we had made up our minds'—I declare I'd no notion what he was coming to all—'but I knew better than my wife'—the hurry he's in to say my wife; the breath was out of me of me when I read it—'that it would be unfair ca you, and I was selfish enough, besides, to think you would be better able to help us afterwards with father if you had done nothing to help us beforehand. The end is, that Kitty and I were married in Dublin this morning, with only Lady Frayne to support us. We are now going south for a week to give you time to recover yourselves and bring his worship to reason; and—mamma will tell you the rest to-motrow.'—Mamma teo, if you please," said Barbara with, for the first time, the least touch of jealousy in her voice.

But Do ra was laughing at the letter, and with Barbara and Lady Frayne.

He was very seldom at the trouble of excusing himself in his own eyes, but in this instance he satisfied himself that his own conduct was justified by the conduct of the newly-married pair; and he was secretly delighted that they had married each other without his consent or knowledge, since it gave him an additional and more plausible pretext for adhering to his old policy.

Lady Frayne was less disturbed than Barbara, feeling sure that Anthony would be obliged soon to face the situation as it now stood. Meanwhile, she said they should both live at Doyne and for as long as they liked,

as they liked,
Arthur was kept somewhat in the dark

Dora herself retired early that evening, though she punished her curiosity in doing so, for she would greatly have liked to see what reception Anthony gave to the news which his sister had to impart. But as Barbara had begun to signal her from the moment when they entered the drawing-room, and as there was no mistaking the signals—Barbara's need of unbosoming herself increasing with the lapse of seconds—Dora said good-night after her first cup of tea.
