LORD LISLE'S DAUGHTER

By C. M. Braeme

Can you find time for one dance with me?" he asked, gently. You are surrounded by so many courtiers I have little chance, I fear.

He was somewhat startled by the expression of her eyes as she raised them to his face; for once her secret shone there—passion and tenderness lingered in their dark depths. In her heart she wondered that he did not know how utterly indifferent she was to every one but himself.

Her only reply was rising and placing her hand on his arm. Rita was a good dancer—graceful and easy, every movement full of harmony and the very poetry of motion.

The music sounded sweetly and softly. She never forgot the happiness of that time. Philip's face smiling down into hers; Philip's arm, with its strong, light clasp around her; Philip's voice whispering kind words—it was one half hour of perfect happiness. She saw admiring eyes follow her; she heard murmurs of admiration from those who watched her; but she was indifferent to all and everything save Philip.

The last notes of the waltz died away, and Philip, turning to her, said abruptly as his glance fell upon her bright face. He saw the light in her dark eyes; he saw the blush-rose in her bosom; its fragrance came to him like a faint, sweet whisper. Her beauty had never struck Philip so forcibly before.

You should be tired," he resumed, but I see no trace of fatigue.

And I feel none," she replied, with a smile.

She carried in her hand a bouquet of white roses and lilies. Philip bent over them.

Give me one of those flowers, belle coquine," he said, in memory of a dance I shall never forget.

He meant nothing more than a pretty, flattering compliment, but the words thrilled the girl's heart. She took a delicate rosebud, half shrouded in green leaves, from her fragrant bouquet.

You will leave it somewhere to me and die," she said.

Nay," replied Philip, gallantly; it shall live near my heart.

A shadow startled them. Looking up, Rita saw the countess by her side. The pretty coquette was looking her best that evening. Her rich white dress looped was up with white lilies, her fair hair beautifully arranged; white lilies drooped from it; the same delicate flowers nestled in her bodice.

I am interrupting a pretty scene," she said. You English people understand the sentimental, after all. Mr. Lisle, I have been looking for you. The Princess Doriel wishes for an introduction. Prepare yourself to be all that is fascinating.

Philip did not respond with his usual alacrity, and a pretty look, half smile, half frown, came over the lady's face. I see," she said. You would rather remain here.

Yes," said Philip. If I consulted inclination only I would rather remain here; but your wish, Madame la Comtesse, is my law.

I shall be glad to rest here for a few minutes," said Rita. Do not mind leaving me alone.

They went away together. She wished to be alone to dream over the happiness that she believed was coming to her—to dream over the words and looks that made her music and sunshine. Not there, where at any moment a gay crowd might surround her. Rita went through the long conservatory, out into the pleasant, moonlit garden, where the lilies and roses perfumed the night air. She sat down on one of the pretty seats placed near the fountain. The night was solemn and still; pale stars gleamed in the darkling sky; the moonbeams gave a silver radiance to water and trees; the flowers were sleeping; only the roses seemed to be awake and greeting her with perfume. Far off, like the sweet, faint echo of a dream, she heard the rise and fall of the music. She was alone—alone with the beauty of the summer night and her own love.

He is beginning to love me," she thought.

He had called her Rita; he had lingered by her side; he had asked for the flower. He would love her in time; and earth held no pleasure, no happiness, for her save in his love. She had believed ambition, pride, and love of admiration to be the master-passions of her life. This love was even stronger. She would rather—All ten thousand times rather—be poor with Philip than share the throne of a king.

I love him," she murmured—who never knew what love meant—who never cared for it! I love him—and he must love me in return!

Nothing like pity crossed her mind for the man who had cared so much for her—who had left her believing that she would be true to him and wait for him.

When the thought of Ralph Ashton came it was with a sense of lashing and contempt—a wonder that she could ever have endured the sound of his voice or the touch of his hands.

Out among the lilies and roses she dreamed of the love she hoped to win—of the bright future, of the title, the honors, the grandeur that awaited her. The solemn stars, the sleeping flowers, the whispering wind brought no bright or holy thoughts—they brought no remorse, no pity, no compunction—and she smiled brightly, thinking that her evil deed had prospered and would bear good fruit.

Chapter XV.

Philip," said Lord Lisle to his nephew, a few days after the ball, have you ever thought of marrying?"

Mr. Lisle laughed.

As a remote possibility, uncle," he said. If you ask the question seriously, I have never thought earnestly of it.

NEWSPAPERS MUST COST MORE

The action of the paper Controller in permitting the newspaper manufacturers to increase their price to $20 a ton—an immediate raise of $12, on top of their previous advanced—is already having its effect upon the newspaper publishing companies. A number of the publishers have decided to increase the subscription price, and the Sarnia Observer is one of the earliest to announce that in future its yearly subscription will be $5.00 in the city and $4.00 by mail. Other papers will have to do likewise, or go out of business.

The use of coal in golf and country clubs this winter is forbidden.
