Miss Croft did not like to say how often Mrs. Ford had told her this. "And did I tell you," continued her aunt, "that the Honourable and Reverend Robert St. Aubin is expected?" "Yes, ma'am."

"And Mr. and Mrs. Werden?"

"Yes, ma'am; you gave me a list of about thirty persons," said Miss Croft, who began to fear that she should be inflicted with the list again. "Yes, mamma," exclaimed Rachel very innocently,

"I am sure Miss Croft knows who are coming; for I have heard their names so often, that I can repeat them all off; and Mary Mathison and I have been trying to put them in rhyme; but we could find no good word that would answer to Dwyer." "Well, my dear," remarked Mrs. Ford, who was

"Very civil indeed of his lordship," said Mrs. Ford, as she put down the note; "I only hope now that the Hon. and Rev. Robert St. Aubin will come; and we shall have a nice party."

"I am glad to say," continued Mr. Ford, throwing another note towards her, "that he is coming too." "Well that is deligtful!" exclaimed Mrs. Ford, having finished the note, which was as civil and laconic as the former.

Mrs. Ford raised her eyes to that with which her husband was then occupied; the contents of this, as far as she could gather from Mr. Ford's looks, did not appear to afford him as much pleasure as the two

Her husband's last remark, and the expression apparent in his countenance, which seemed to say pretty plainly, I thought all along that Mr. Dwyer would deceive us, prepared Mrs. Ford for what was coming.
