A Love Affair

"You seem to have a great affection for this fellow-scoundrel," he said, with

"Don't call names, Mr. Fenton," he "Don't call names, Mr. Fenton," he said, hoarsely. "He was always worth two of your so-called honest men at the worst of time and if you know anything of him you know that. Affection for him!" he stretched out his strong arm; "I'd give that arm for him this minute!" The man's evident sincere expression of devotion amazed Rawson Fenton even in that moment of excitement, amazed and filled him with half-savage envy.

"You have had money from him?" asked Rawson Fenton, keenly.
"Yes. He gave it to me without the

"You are hard up, you say?"
"How can such a chap as me get a living?"
"Difficult, I daresay, if you want to keep out of jail. Well, for the sake of old time"—he smiled—"I will help, you. I will tell you what I will do. Take my offer or leave it. If you take it, we remain good friends; refuse it, and—"He shrugged his shoulders.
"Let's hear it," said Ned, roughly. Rawson Fenton took some gold from his waistcoat pocket, and selecting three sovereigns, held them in his outstretched palm, right before the man's eyes, which instantly became glued on them.
"I will give you these now. Go to London and settle there. Send me your address, and on every Saturday I will send you the same amount. Three pounds a week is a little over the hundred and fifty a year. Not a bad salary for doing nothing, my friend."

He stretched out his hand and took the money, and turned it over with loving glances at it before, he put it in his pocket.
"That's all right," remarked Rayson.

"That's all right," remarked Rawson Fenton. "And now I think our pleasant little interview may be brought to a conclusion. Be off, my friend. Go to London as soon as you can, and enjoy yourself. Send me the address of your directives and vow able to the conclusion. diggings, and you shall get your allow-ance regularly. Remember, all I ask you to do is—nothing but hold your tongue. Good night!" and he nodded a dismissal.

"Will he go and warn him?" he asked "Will be go and warn him?" he asked himself. Then as Ned turned and tramped Londonward, he muttered, "No; three pounds a week are not to be resisted. I have got him." The stars seem to dance in a mad whirl over Rawson Fenton as he walked to the blacksmith's, where his brougham swaited him.

The marquis pointed to the placard with his whip, and laughed.

Fate, however, seemed to frown that morning, for as they rode into the lane leading to the moorland, a horseman that it was the new candidate.

"I see you have set to work, Mr. Fenton," said the marquis.
"Yes," he said. "I have commenced by making Berrington hideous, but whether I win or lose, I promise to have all the bills washed off."

"If I could persuade Miss Grahame to wear my badge!" he said, his eyes flashing on her face,

"I must not keep you. Good-morning!" and he rode on.

The election was to take place in little more than a month—that is, at the end of October—and though several most important thus far had been allowed to stand over for the marquis' convenience, for Mr. Rawson Fenton had membered Lord Brakespeare's promise membered Lord Brakespeare's promise that he would speak, and had chosen that he would speak, and had chosen that he should speak at this large meet-

"Well, dearest," he said, "glad it's all over and you are back home?"

"I detest the whole of it. You won't speak again, Wolfe?"

"No," he replied, with a laugh; "but I suppose I shall be mixed up in the affair more or less. Unless," he added, "I cut it all and get away."

"You are going away." she said, try-

"You are going away," she said, try-ing to speak calmly; but her voice fal-tered pitcously.

"Well, I thought of it," he said.

"Well, I thought of it," he said, speaking as naturally and easily as he could. "You see, I should escape all this election nuisance, as you suggest."
"Yes, you would," she assented; but her heart sank lower and lower.
"The only objection is that I don't care about going alone," he resumed, in the same tone.

He had not forgotten the service she had rendered him on the night of the bail, and, ever on the watch for persons likely to be of use to him, he meant to keep up the acquaintanceship.

"But—but it will have to be a grand wedding, then?" said Constance, reluctantly.

"Not necessarily. A little grand, perhaps. We mustn't despise the duchess of a little gayety. I will go over and see her to-morrow, dear. And now go to bed and get a good night's sleep. I can't tell you how happy you have made me."

Constance kissed her—both the women's eyes were full of tears—and then went to her room, but not before she had paid her nightly visit to Arol and give nhim his "dream kiss," as he called it.

The duchess was delighted at the idea. The duke not only raised no objection, but of his own accord offered to give the bride away.

Constance, for some days, could scarcely realize that she was to be married in three weeks; but presently, as the necessary preparations had to be made, the truth came home to her.

Whether the wedding were to grand or a quiet one, she had determined that her dress should be strictly quiet and simple.

On the question of bridesmaids Constance was less clear, only stipulating that they should be limited to two.

Lady Ruth was asked, as a matter of course, and, to Constance's surprise, accepted, and accepted in a note which was a masterpiece of sisterly affection. A niece of the duchess was accepted as the second.
