the first experiments began prior to the advent of the telegraph. It is thought and emotion that are the source of our good and bad fortune, according to Mr. Rogers.

"If we persistently think well of everybody," he continued, "we shall in time have no enemies. Kindly thought is a shield that the arrows of malice cannot penetrate. We make our own friends and foes, health and disease, heaven and hell. We alone are responsible." In cases of impulsive crime, where a fatal blow had been struck on the spur of the moment, examination often had shown, said the lecturer, that it was the result of long-smoldering hatred, of pent-up emotional energy that expressed itself before reason could act. "The would-be murderer," he continued, "is already a murderer in the realm of thought. On the stage of his imagination the tragedy has repeatedly been played. If we would not be murderers we must not think murder."
