Meanwhile U. S. Buyers Come In and Boost Price to Double the Figure.

Middlesex farmers worked overtime on Saturday and will continue to do on until they harvest the remainder of their potato crops. Prices have soared on the local market because the majority of the farmers have not yet dug their potatoes, and with American buyers in the county buying right and left there is not much hope of the average consumer laying in a winter's supply under $2 to $2.50

John Farrell of the immigration department said today that there were thousands of bushels of potatoes still in the soil in the Forest district and hundreds of barrels of apples still on the tree. It was hoped that the apples would be saved, but the quality would not be so good.

Dealers expect that the market will shortly be flooded with potatoes, but point out that they will be in competition with United States buyers. They expect to buy around $2 a bag, but with foreign competition, they but with foreign competition, they may have to go a trifle higher. Saturday was the first good day for digging potatoes that the farmers have had in over two weeks. This afternoon they were hard at it again,
