THE YEAR 1896.

The year of grace 1896 seemed to promise at its opening to be one of strife and bloodshed. The war cloud hung dark and threatening over Great Britain. It had advanced from the south and from the west, and seemed about to burst as the year opened. During December Mr. Olney's dispatch and the President's message, affirming the right of the United States to interfere in the settlement of the Venezuelan controversy, had been followed by the denial on the part of Lord Salisbury of any such right. President Cleveland's position was supported by the Legislature and the press of the country, and threats of war resounded through the length and breadth of the United States.

Dr. Jameson's raid into the Transvan had taken place during the last week of the old year, and on New Year's day he was defeated at Krngersdorp and compelled to surrender The telegram sent to President Kruger by the Emperor of Germany and the unfriendly attitude of the German press gave England reason to believe that what was already an embarrassing complication with a small and distant counfry under her own protection, might end in a war with a strong and powerful of jealous and unfriendly powers.
