The Emby Mines of Parasula.

From the London Dolly Nesse.

Owing to the very great jealeusy of the Surmess Government the ruby mines have been carefully guarded from all strangers, and from this cause our knowledge regarding them is very small. The mines are said to be only about sixty miles northeast of Mandalay.

The extent of ground over which the rubles exist has not been precisely ascertained, but it is believed to extend at least over 100 aquare miles.

The value of these mines was reported a few years ago to be worth annually from $12,000 to $15,000; but this includes sapphires and other stones as well. The mines were wholly royal property, and the stones were a monopoly of the King. From this is may be assumed that the Indian Government will now claim the ruby mines. The "gem bed," as it is called, or strats in which the rubies are found, varies considerably at different points in its depth. Pits are sink down vertically till a gem bed has been touched, and then formoutal galleries are found saveral feet in depth. The earth of the gem bed is brought up to the surface, where it is carefully washed, and the gems are soured. The meet of the rubies are small, but large ones without a flaw.

The lapidaries or gam polishers are in the capital, and not at the mines. The polishing process is performed by pounding the smaller gems and worthless stones. Flues are pounded and mixed with other substances, and four wide. The good rubies are rubbed on this. When the stene has been ground down roughly on this a fluer cake is ampleyed, and the finishing touch to the gems are given by rubbing it on plates of breas and copper.

Sapphires are also found with the rubies. The people amployed manage to secrete small stones, and these are smuggled from the mines to the capital.
