Pedda Penke (Great Mischief).

This is the name of a village about ten miles to the east of Bobbili. Years ago Mr. Churchill bought a piece of land, dug a well, built a house and stationed a native preacher there. For some reason, unknown to me, the teacher was recalled, and then the house tumbled down and the land was leased. And I believe none of the villagers had become Christians.

Before going to the hills, Mr. Gulliver decided to distribute our Bobbili workers somewhat. And with this in view, Sayamma, a Bible-women, and David, a native preacher, and I, took our tents and went to Pedda Penke. We spent several days there and everywhere—among low caste and high caste people—we heard loving testimonies to the memory of the Christian man who had once taught them. When we told them that we were thinking of sending another teacher to them, they appeared to be much pleased, and one man offered to allow him to live in one of his houses until our house could be built. With a glowing report the spies returned, and Mr. Garrison gave directions to have the house built. In less than two months, David was located there.

A few weeks later, a message came to me saying that a goldsmith (the goldsmiths are the aristocracy (?) of the village) had professed faith in Christ, and was coming daily to David's house to hear him explain the Gospel of Matthew.

Not long after, the young fellow, who had often visited me when I was in Pedda Penke, appeared at the Mission house. He told me that his people were very angry with him, and that they feared he would break caste—but he believed Christ had saved him, and he wished to be baptized. But as the Missionary was not in Bobbili, he was asked to wait, and assured that Christ would keep His own and not allow them to suffer to their hurt.

After his return to his home, a storm began to gather. The young man's (Krishnamurti) Bible was destroyed; he was forbidden to go to David's house, and when he disobeyed was locked up.

One day the father learned that his son was again talking with the Christians (a Christian from Bobbili had gone to visit David for a week) and in a passion he caught up a stick and called for followers. Soon an angry
