

feathers don't always make fine birds, and all feathers don't suit all birds alike. I have an English family in Paris. The amount that those girls spent on their dress was perfectly frightful, and they were never fit to be seen. Sometimes they would all come out dressed alike, as if the family had bought a web of cloth. When they were not dressed alike, their things seemed to get mixed up, and the effect was most disastrous. They had no idea of neatness. I never saw one of them without something wrong about her."

"Were they pretty?" I asked. "Yes, very pretty," she replied, "and this prettiness is what spoils English girls; they are so proud of their looks that they think that it does not signify what they wear, while we Americans are naturally modest. However good-looking nature may be, we have no use, we—At this moment the conversation was cut short by a citizen from the far West, arrayed in a black frock coat, black "trunk" and an embroidered but crumpled shirt, with a large and valuable diamond stuck in his eye, who came up and claimed acquaintance with my fair friend. "I was just saying that we are a very modest nation," she said to the citizen, but as I perceived by the oratorical attitude into which this man of the West threw himself that he was about to treat this natural characteristic of his nation exhaustively, I withdrew to my breakfast, to meditate over the lecture on how to dress and how not to dress, by an American girl, who certainly enforced precept by example, for she herself was exceedingly well "turned out."
