Simple Experiment Showing How to Find Master Eye—Billiard Players Best Illustration of Eye-Mastership.

In the physiology of sport the eyes, the brain and the voluntary muscles are the three most important things.

Every sportsman who depends upon his vision to measure distances or the accuracy of his shots, or the position of his feet, has what is termed the "master eye."

For instance, every time the baseball pitcher tries to put the sphere sideways and can only see the batter with one eye, as he sends the ball away, the golfer on the green, as he addresses the ball before he makes the drive, has his eye on the next hole, and as he stands sideways is measuring the distance between greens with his "master eye."

Another method of finding the master eye has long been known to gun makers. When they want to find out they get a man to aim at some object and carefully how he goes about his work, and from his movements that which is the master eye can be detected; that is, whether the muscles are acting in a right or left eye vertical plane.
