

be wrong informed, the delicate ties of amity and friendship will be corroded, and many a noble sentiment will be dislodged from the breast it loved to inhabit.

AGAIN—It frequently happens that a boy who attends a seminary of learning, has brothers or sisters at home who do not attend ; are these properly instructed with respect to genteel behavior ? if not, their conduct must have a great influence on the boy. He perhaps is one half of his time in their company, and as example works more forcibly than precept, it is much if he is not led to copy both their actions and behaviour, so that what is done by the master at school is undone at home.

Lastly. Do parents interest themselves as they ought, in this particular ? Do they themselves
