

ANNABEL

OR THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXII.

AGONISING REALISATIONS—STRIVINGS FOR LIBERTY.

Her heavy, joyless heart being made still more dreary by the weird and mournful sounds of the storm, she betook herself to her couch, and trying to find in the oblivion of sleep a forgetfulness of her woes. In preparation for this, she wound up her watch, and found that the time was past midnight, therefore just about the witching time of night when by the credulous it is supposed supernatural powers are let loose, and the disembodied are apt to manifest themselves in the places which they haunt. A very natural spot for such ghostly visitation was the solitary and deserted house in which she was imprisoned; and though Annabel was not naturally superstitious, she caught herself listening to the sough and the creaking and rustling with a quickened imagination, which sought to attribute the sounds to other agencies besides the wind.

Especially was she attracted by the regularly recurring creak and clank not far from the door of her chamber, and as the latter was not quite closed these sounds which came to her with such startling clearness that the desire seized her to know whence they proceeded. Taking the light in her hand, therefore she went out into the corridor and stood listening. What ghostly shadows the flickering light cast on the long empty passage, and as the wind caused the flame to sway and rise and fall, lights and glooms were produced in which such circumstances and at such an hour could easily be conjured by a nervous mind into shapes and influences of unearthly character.

Annabel could not forbear a colder as her eye followed the moving shadows, but she had come forth to find the origin of one particular sound, and stood listening for its repetition. She had not long to wait, for in less than a minute she heard it, and her first conjecture was verified. It came from the foot of the stair, and seemed to proceed from the door. Crossing the passage, she stood on the top step, held the candle at arm's length down the stair and bent forward with an inquiring gaze. For some moments all was silent, then a gust of wind was heard to smite the walls outside; presently it whistled along the corridor, raising groaning echoes; the candle flickered to and fro, then the creak came, and to Annabel's amazement, she distinctly saw the door open up for an inch or two, then fall forward, and as light so the hard metallic clank was emitted. This was capable of but one explanation: the door was open.

With a wild throb of excitement she glided down the steps, and found this to be true. A slight push caused the door to move back, and the wider vista of the lower corridor was revealed to her view. A glance showed her how the singular circumstances had occurred. In returning from his last visit from her chamber when he brought the fresh candle, Dick had unwittingly drawn the bolt before he had properly closed the door, the result being that the former had not gone into but had remained outside its socket in the stone lintel, leaving the door unfastened.

On making the discovery, Annabel stood in breathless excitement, for on her mind the possibility of escape had flashed and the first shock had caused her to tremble violently, till the light shook in her unsteady hand and her limbs threatened to lose their power of support.

DIETARY.—Epps' Cocoa.—GRAFFEL AND COMFORTING.—By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills.
