A Lover's
GERALDINE:
Romance.

"I quite forgot in the exciting circumstances of which you and Captain Morrison honored me on Saturday, to mention the fact that our common friend, who occupied the room at Bankside before me, has left England for the sake of his health, under the care of a medical man in whom the highest confidence may be placed. The manner of your question on Saturday took me so much by surprise that I felt I should not unnecessarily by my reply; all that I meant to imply by my hesitating speech, which seemed to inspire you with so much terror, was that our friend, although not absolutely in bad health, has still, through unfortunate circumstances in his career to which we need not more clearly refer, undergone his constitution in such a manner that the constant attendance of an experienced physician is the best guarantee we can have for the maintenance of his strength and for his gradual complete restoration. I believe you saw him last Friday, on which occasion you could not fail to have been struck by the change in him, due, I am sorry to say, for it is better to speak plainly—more to his obstinate refusal of his malady by stimulants and narcotics than to the malady itself. You can understand that such a patient, enfolded in mind as well as body by such an injudicious course of conduct, requires as much skill in his medical attendant; he is fortunate, however, in having attracted the attention of a distinguished physician, to whom it is but justice to say that our friend had become so much attached that the best results are to be hoped for from this trip on the continent under such happy auspices."

The letter contained nothing more than was of interest to Geraldine, who she went to the end and put it calmly into her pocket, believing her conduct to be quite unobtrusive; for she did not know that her face had become so ghastly white that it was patent to the two keen watchers at the table—Eleanor never came down to breakfast—that she had suffered some great shock. Still confident, and singing as she went, to disarm suspicion, she went to her room after breakfast to fulfill her first morning task of examining the flowers; but no sooner was she alone shut in the big old room where no one was likely to disturb her, than she sank down on a chair beside the little table which generally had her first breakfast and laid her hands on either side of the bowl of carnations and ferns which her overflowing eyes could not see.

"And I can do nothing—nothing!" she sobbed to herself just above her breath, and then she sprang up with a start, and dried her eyes, and upset the bowl of flowers in nervous haste to be busy, as she heard some one open the door.

Her heart sank as she recognized her husband's step without looking round. He stopped before he had come very near her.

"I wish to see that letter, Geraldine."

Her hands became suddenly still; she did not ask what letter he meant this time. Finding her way to her pocket with fingers that shook almost as if for some moments they were literally unable to feel the folds of her gown, she brought out at last with both hands, everything her pocket contained, and held it submissively toward him. Her terror as she saw the letter shaking like a leaf, was pitiable to see. It infuriated him.

"Give me the letter! I only want the letter!"

"Take it, please. I can't see."

It was true; the tears were falling fast from her eyes and blinding her. She snatched the letter he wanted, and she sank down at last with her head beside the table and waited. While he was reading, she had time to collect her thoughts. Her terror as she saw the letter shaking like a leaf, was pitiable to see. It infuriated him.

worst was over as soon as he spoke, and she could answer him.

"So this is the drunken blackguard who you will die, and risk your husband, and risk your reputation, to go and see!"

This angry opening braced Geraldine to the conflict, and she answered quietly and most unexpectedly. "Yes."

"You have singular taste."

"Taste! No. No man could be less to my taste than the man I deceived you to go and see the other day."

"Most touching loyalty in a woman who is perpetually deceiving her husband!"

"I shouldn't deceive you if you were human. But, when you have declared that your chief purpose in life is to run down a man who is already persecuted and driven mad, and ruined, it is no wonder I take his part against you. Oh, Philip, be all together, down and die!"

"No, I am not satisfied. If I believed you, perhaps I might be, but a woman who deceives her husband flagrantly twice in the course of a week is not to be trusted. How am I to know that this letter was not concocted between you and the man I saw on Saturday on purpose to mislead me, to work upon my pity for a wretch who ought to be outside the pale of your sympathy—a murderer, a helplessly hopeless drunkard?"

Geraldine could not bear this. She started up, as angry as he.

"Believe what you like. Believe that we are all three in a vile conspiracy against you; then you can abuse all together, accuse us all together, and get rid of us all together! Nothing short of that will content you—or me!"

And she fled along the room to the door, and left him.

Later in the morning Geraldine heard her husband giving orders for the physician to be brought around, and she felt rather frightened when half an hour afterward, she saw him driving down toward the lodge, with his own man at the back beside the groom.

She was in the conservatory, and she opened the outer door to watch, wondering what this meant. Then she heard a step behind her, and, turning, found the old butler, with his eyes gravely fixed on the salver in his hand.

The captain desired me to give you this, madam, as soon as he was gone. Geraldine took the note, and stood playing with it for some minutes before she opened it. That its contents were of a momentous interest she was sure—that it was a farewell she guessed. The physician was out of sight before she read it.

"Dear Geraldine—I have done what you have at last confessed, after implying it for a long time, is the only thing to content you—I have rid you of my presence. It is not my fault that I have been unable to please you in any other way. You are always taunting me with my motive in marrying you and declaring that I succeed you in my wish for revenge. Has it ever occurred to you to analyze your own motives for marrying me? If you will do so, I think you will find that you were moved by pique, or enmity, or some other feeling connected with me, and my personal qualities; otherwise your indifference would never have contented me to die so easily—I repeat so easily for the discovery of my intentions toward the man who had brought dishonor upon my family would have led to his death."

A little four-year-old girl, the daughter of Mr. Joseph Wood, of Huron street, Brantford, met with an accident Tuesday that may result fatally. She was playing on the boulevard opposite her home, when a horse began to crop the grass. Suddenly the child was struck and caught the child full in the face, inflicting several lacerations. The little girl was unconscious for some hours, and her condition is yet very serious.

Miss Rivers, of Springfield farm, the last child of the late Richard Rivers, who died a short time ago, left a sum of money to St. Thomas' Church, Wainwright, and also a legacy to the rectory fund of the same parish. This is the second bequest which this church has received in the last year.

Chatham's Way of Commemorating the Jubilee.

Burglary Near Chatham—A Little Girl Badly Injured by the Kick of a Horse.

Recent frosts have done much damage about Berlin.

A dispatch from Gleichen, Man., says that Henry Woolie, a Belgian, was drowned while bathing in the reservoir there.

Chatham will commemorate the Queen's jubilee by the establishment of public baths and a convalescent home at Erie.

It is expected that the military demonstration held in Brantford on Monday will yield a surplus of from $50 to $100 after all expenses are paid.

Lieut.-Col. Scott, of Kincardine, the newly-elected deputy grand master of the Orange Order, will preside at the next meeting to be held at Ottawa.

The Twenty-seventh Battalion Band, Sandwich, has been corresponding with Prof. Lindenberg, of Toronto, in regard to his acting as band instructor. He will be given a trial.

The customs authorities at Port Huron recently seized 900 gross of buttons belonging to Y. Shantz, of Berlin, Ont. It is claimed they were undervalued. The case will be appealed.

James K. Baker, aged 24, son of Thomas Baker, of London, Ont., has died of consumption of the brain and erysipelas. He was ill twelve days in the hospital, and it is supposed that his injuries were so severe.

The frosts in the Walkerton district have, it is feared, injured the cherry trees and small fruits severely. Apples and plums crop is so far assured. Hay and fall wheat are looking well. Seeding and potato planting are over.

Duncan McDonald, storekeeper and postmaster, four miles from Chatham, Ont., found his place ransacked Thursday morning; $16 in cash, a revolver, eight registered letters and a quantity of postage stamps had been carried away.

A passenger and a freight motor car collided in a desolate spot near the crossing of the passenger car, stuck to his post when he saw the accident could not be avoided, and suffered a broken arm and some severe bruises. A number of passengers were also injured.
