The Matines

How the French word metines, which veryone knows means morning-time, afternoon performances is not generally known. About fifty years ago classical concerts became very popu-lar in Paris, and were given at 11 o'clock in the morning, and were called "Matinees Musicales." The ladies of fashion, however, soon found this hour too early, following so closely on the balls and dinners of the previous night, so the hour was changed to noon, then to 1 o'cleck, and later to 2 o'clock. The success of these concerts prompted the theatre directors try day performances also, and they were called "Matinees Theatrales." From Paris the custom passed to London, the name "matinee" being retained

Six Greatest Composers. A gentleman much interested in nusical matters asked me the other day to name him the six greatest comosers. Offhand, I gave him the names of six musical giants, who, in my opinion, might be considered the greatest. He wasn't at all satisfied. He had a list up his sleeve which differed two important respects from mine. He also said that he had three eminent authorities on his side. How is it possible, after all, for any authority to state positively that any six men were the world's greatest composers. One might name at least half a dozen who night justly lay claim to being greater than any other. It all depends upon the particular phase of work in which the composer was engaged. How could anyone for instance say that Bach was greater than Beethoven? artistic efforts were pursued along entirely different lines In going over the names of the great men of musical history you will find that each one were beginning to think that the Ger-Bach was the greatest writer of fugue; tions through the ballot.
