The Civil Guards, who have rendered important services to the unfortunate vic tims of the terrible inundations of the valleys of Murcia and Alicante, saved (a Madrid correspondent writes) a curious being near Lorca. It appears that for the last eighteen years a man aged 40, and described as immensely stout, with a beard black as ink, reaching down to his waist, and nails of terrible length, has been living in a small and solitary house or rather in a small and solitary house, or rather hovel. He was its sole inhabitant; but it hovel. He was its sole inhabitant; but it turns out that he has a father and more than one brother. He has never allowed them, however, or any one else, to see him during his voluntary imprisonment. The hovel contained no bed or utensils of any kind except a box, on which he sat. The father took his food to him every twenty-four hours regularly, pushing it through a hole in the door, which door was never opened. The strange creature's only garment was a shirt, which he changed at the end of every five years. His existence end of every five years. His existence would never have been suspected but for
