Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, I would just like some clarification. Normally, when a motion comes from this side of the House it is votes for first on this side and then those who would vote against. It would start with the government benches and then come over here to the Liberals, the Official Opposition. I am wondering why on that particular vote the Liberals began on the second vote and then followed by a few Tories who needed to make up that number. Why the difference? Is that standard procedure?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There was really no particular reason for the vote to be taken one way or the other, as we do have people from both sides of the House voting yes or no on different motions.

The next question is on Motion No. 45.

The House divided on Motion No. 45, which was negated on the following division:

(Division No. 164)
