cattle, released from their long confinement, rush joyously over the fields. The plough, long disused and rusty, is brought out, and the farmer prepares to tear up the ground, and bury the seed in its bosom. All nature awakes; her slumber is broken, and the soil is ready to yield its tribute to man, the lord of all below. Nature has doffed her night cap, and shaken slumber from her lids. Every Farmer should have a garden; for health, for profit, and for pleasure. For health, as nothing, in the form of diet, contributes more to this blessing, than a variety of choice fruits and vegetables for his table; while the exercise and recreation which the cares and the beauties of the garden excite, are highly promotive of health,—it is incredible to those who have not had occasion to observe the fact, how large a part of the sustenance of a Farmer's family may come out of his little garden. Why do not our farmers throw around their dwellings the beautiful ornament of flowering vines and similar products, which might be cultivated with little care, and without expense?
