River Platte Times goes for that Govornment. It remarks:—

The flowery days of the Tigre had already passed away. This is an utilitarian age. A practical gentleman some years ago, cast his eyes upon the favoured spot, and seeing all the necessary appliances for his trade, planted himself there, and, from that date, we may say, the history of the Tigre commenced. Sheds soon sprung up, followed by others of greater extent; dwellings appeared on all sides, and although at first they were but workmen's cottages, nevertheless they were an earnest of what was coming. Other enterprising men followed this pioneer of civilization, and in a few short years the Tigre became what we now see it. To turn out these men from the short years the light became what we now see it. To turn out these men from the spot, when so much time and money has been expended, on such excuses, is unpar-donable; and to tell them that they must forthwith remove so much higher up or lower down the river, because their presence there is conducive to headaches in sence there is conducive to headaches in certain quarters, appears to us childish, for what guarantee will they have that, after having moved a second time, and spent an enormous amount of money, they may not receive a second summons to go packing, because some nervous old lady (in pantaloons, or otherwise) is offended at their presence.
