Brady gave himself up.

A coroner's jury was speedily summoned, and an investigation took place, while the train was delayed in order not to carry off the witnesses. Brady made a statement, telling the gentlemen and ladies "that no one could regret the affair more than he, but one of them had to go and he preferred to stay and see his family again. He hoped that he would never be torced to do such a thing again, and rested the justice of his case with the coroner's jury." That body acquitted Brady on the ground of justifiable homicide and advised him to be more careful in the future. They objected chiefly to his shooting a man among so many passengers. It was dangerous and might lead to fatal errors and other unpleasant results. The train and jury and Brady, and the other passengers went on and left the corpse to take care of itself.
