

But these are mere facts and outside the province of Mr. Hutchison's art. Mr. Hutchison has not visited archives. He has not even visited libraries. Had he done so he might have felt obliged to consider, for example, Lord Byng's letter published by Sir Harold Nicolson in his study of H. M. King George V. This alone would have created an awkward difficulty, and Mr. Hutchison might have been compelled to acknowledge that, after all, Dr. Forsey's analysis of the constitutional crisis of 1926 is more nearly correct than a Liberal apologist would care to admit.

Students of politics must accept Mr. Hutchison's work as an example of propaganda as it is employed in Canadian politics. They cannot regard it as a serious source book or as a help in understanding Canadian political movements.
