Problem Solved In England By Model Villages

Timbered. The cottages contain five and six rooms. Rents vary from 5s. 9d. to 4s. 6d. per week and with each cottage is included a full quarter acre of land which affords a fine garden plot. It is possible to take land from the company. Some have taken as much as seven acres. The company owning the village has made it a co-operative affair by allowing the residents to share in the profits. On taking a cottage a tenant takes a certain number of shares in the village. If, later, he wishes to leave he receives his share back again. It may be he will wish to keep his connection with the company, in which case he is allowed to do so. Tilmore Gardens is the name of the new village, and if the scheme works well here it argues for success elsewhere because living is high owing to the residential character of the neighborhood.

WH IS SLOGAN

It was moved in amendment by Rev. Mr. Linscott and seconded by Rev. Mr. Kelly, "That we recommend that steps be taken by the Alliance, such as will lead to the holding of one 'Go to church' Sunday campaign. When the question was put to a vote the result was a tie and the chairman cast his vote in favor of the original motion, thus deciding in favor of a month's campaign.

WHEN BIG MEN CLASH IN THE BRITISH HOUSE

Fighting Speeches by the Leaders in Great Britain—Bonar Law, Carson and Redmond, All Engaged in a Lively Debate.

English papers just to hand contain full reports of the opening of the present session of the British House of Commons, an opening marked by unusual speeches on the Home Rule question. Sir Henry Norman was the first member to arrive at the House on Tuesday morning to secure a seat for the session, waiting at the doors from 6.50 to 8 o'clock to be the first man in.

Before taking his seat on the front Bench, Mr. Bonar Law shook hands with both Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George in earnest of his desire to fall in with the appeal contained in His Majesty's speech.

Mr. Craig, an Ulster Unionist, of great girth, caused a laugh by referring to the crowded state of the House, and suggesting that the Nationalists betake themselves in the galleries, as they had imposed a rule of silence upon themselves.

New members were introduced, the appearance of Mr. Munro, the Lord Advocate, being the signal for remarks from the Opposition side with regard to the contest at Wick Burghs.

Mr. W. F. Roch, Liberal member for Pembrokeshire, in Court dress, moved the address in reply, and Mr. Gordon Howard, K.C., who sits for Leicester, seconded in a masterly speech of exceptional ability.

Then came a departure from precedent which the Speaker described as an exceptional course. Mr. Walter Long from the front Opposition Bench, moved an official Unionist amendment—

"Humbly representing that it would be disastrous to proceed further with the Government of Ireland Bill until it has been submitted to the judgment of the people."

"How is it possible?" asked Mr. Long, explaining the unusual course taken by the Opposition, "to proceed in the ordinary way with our business when—overwhelming as else—this is the knowledge that for the first time for centuries in the history of this country we are threatened with civil war within the United Kingdom."

"Bayonets and Bullets."

"We hold Home Rule not to be in the best interests of Ireland; we hold it to be fatally injurious to this country. In no circumstances will our party so stultify itself and abandon all its dearest principles by accepting the measure to which it is opposed root and branch."

In Ulster, he went on, there was a force of something like 100,000 men, trained, armed, equipped, determined necessary at the cost of their lives.

conversations were, and must remain in the strictest sense, under the seal of confidence.

"There is one satisfactory feature in these conversations, and it is that the press of this country was, without a single exception, entirely at sea from beginning to end on the subject. (Laughter). That is something in these days, when a man cannot send a letter to his wife without a sinister construction being placed upon it. (Laughter)."

"But I regret to say—and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will share my regret, because I know he was anxious to have some definite result—that these conversations did not produce any definite agreement. While I deeply regret that agreement was not obtained, I do not despair at this moment and never have despaired of the possibility of a settlement."

"I think the language used in the King's Speech ought to find an echo in every quarter of the House, and I will use no last word in regard to this matter of settlement."

The Prime Minister proceeded to point out that the proposal for the exclusion of Ulster was put forward as a choice of what were deemed two evils. He himself looked with favor upon Sir Horace Plunkett's suggestion for the inclusion of Ulster with the option of exclusion after a time.

The full government recognize to the Ulster exclusion the exclusion of Ulster— we cannot divert ourselves of responsibility of initiative in the way of suggestion, though we maintain that our Bill, though capable of improvement, is a sound, statesmanlike, and workable measure.

He conceded that the suggestions made on the other side—such, for instance, as the exclusion of Ulster—are all made for the sake of peace, and it is for the sake of obtaining peace, and as the price of peace, a settlement by agreement, that any suggestions we make will be put forward.

"I do not mean merely the avoidance of civil strife, but that the new system of Irish government, whatever it is, shall start under such conditions and in such an atmosphere as will give it, from the first, a fair chance of working successfully.

"The avoidance of civil war and bloodshed everyone must desire, and there is nothing we won't do, consistent with the maintenance of the fundamental principles, to avoid that terrible calamity. I cannot believe that we are reduced to such an insolvency of statesmanship that we cannot, with an honest mind, with good will, and with determination avoid, if it be possible, the evils and dangers which lie before us."

"I feel it to be our duty—and we intend to discharge that duty without avoidable delay—to submit to them in the spirit and with the two reservations I have made, suggestions which will certainly be honestly put forward and which will certainly be believed will be regarded by all fair-minded men as, at any rate, a serious attempt to arrive at an agreement in this matter, which will consult, not only the interests, but the susceptibilities, of all concerned."

Mr. Clavell-Salter (U.) said that the Nationalists had never ceased to abuse the British soldier, but now they wanted his services.

Mr. Lough (L.) suggested that the objection of the minority in Ireland to the Home Rule Bill would be largely met by the adoption of the principle of proportional representation in the election of the Irish Parliament. (Opposition cries of "No.")

Mr. A. Chamberlain.
Mr. Austen Chamberlain asked if at the last General Election the Government received the authority of the electors to use British troops to shoot down loyal citizens. How was the danger of civil war averted; if the answer was—civil war was made certain.

He urged the exclusion of Ulster because it would remove one great crime which the passage of the bill otherwise entail. At the same time the exclusion of Ulster would not make the bill good or safe, and to a bill he so amended he for one would be no party.

Sir John Simon, the Attorney General, resuming the debate on Wednesday, argued that the opposition cried for a general election at every opportunity, and that they wanted it especially now, not because it would solve the Irish problem, for it would solve it, but because it would tear up the Parliament Act.

Sir Edward Carson.
"Sir Edward Carson, who followed, had a long sustained ovation from the crowded benches behind him. He said that twice the country had decided against Home Rule. The third attempt was condemned by the confession of the Government, and yet they were unable to alter a single word in the bill to meet the new situation."

"Perhaps now that we have reached this point Colonel Seely will give up telling his constituents that I am insane. I do not think that we can take seriously," he said, as like to the vagaries of Sir Edward Carson in this matter. On all other subjects he is eminently sane, but on this he is not. (Loud Opposition cries of "Shame" and "Withdraw" and a voice like every other rat.)

"May also say that I think Mr. Gulland, the corruptor of Wick— (Opposition laughter and Ministerial cries of "Withdraw.")

Mr. Leif Jones rose to a point of order, but the Speaker intimated that though not a pretty word, there was no suggestion that the hon. member for Dumfriesshire had done anything which could possibly have brought him within the scope of the Corrupt Practices Act.

"If it hurts the susceptibilities of the hon. member I will call him the Wicksburgh," remarked Sir Edward Carson.

He protested at any delay in putting forward the government's proposals, and called for an amended home rule bill. Ulstermen had been laughed at and insulted, but had confidence in the strong right arm to resist, but the Opposition could never support a bill which handed over the Unionists in other parts of Ireland to the tender mercies of their enemies.

There were two alternatives before the Government. They must either make proposals which would remove the resistance of Ulster, or they must, however much they dreaded it, submit their Bill to the judgment of the people.

The Opposition amendment was defeated by 333 to 255, a majority of 78 for the Government.
