BUFF COCHINS.

In the year 1843 the first Cochins were introduced into England. Their appearance created a great furor, and the "hen fever" spread rapidly. These birds—we are told by Louis Wright, an excellent authority—had very little of the characteristics of the Cochins of to-day: "they were very long and bare on the legs; the carriage of the head was backward instead of forward; the tails were tolerably abundant, and carried high; the back sloped down to the tail instead of rising to it; they
