

This exposition leaves aside what in competition policy is considered more important than injury to producers — that is, injury to competition. We have already noted that many commentators, including many who argue that U.S. trade law involves an "overall" concept of injury, believe that the anti-dumping provisions should not focus on what is clearly only a "diversion of business" test.