POTS AND KETTLES.

Ther is no change on earth, alack! Old customs with us linger; the pot still calls the kettle black, and points a scornful finger. This metaphore of course is wrong, for pots can do no pointing; but let the purists come along, avaunting and arointing. But men can point, and point they do, with righteous indignation, at all the profiteering crew, of high or humble station. The grocer buys a Sunday suit, and when he's made the payment, he says the government should shoot the maker of that raiment. The tailor to the grocer wends, to buy a few molasses, and then his treasured beard he rends: "The price all reason passes!" The butcher stands beside his block, and butches with a cleaver; he bought some capsules from the doc, to cure his chills and fever. And now he says, "It was a shame, the way that sawbones taxed me; he played a low down, sinful game; he soaked me and he waxed me." The doctor to the butcher goes, to buy a pound of mutton; and says, on leaving, "Heaven knows this meat man is a glutton! My father used to buy a sheep for what this fragment cost me; this butcher's charges, fierce and steep, confound me and exhaust me!" The pots about the kettles wail; the kettles get excited, and say the pots would be in jail if public wrongs were righted.

Does it Pay?

To Paint or Repair

That is the question you have to face in the Fall and Spring. Does it pay to allow your buildings to become decayed and delapidated through lack of paint, or is it cheaper to give them a coat of paint every four or five years, which will keep them practically intact and beautiful.

The answer you already know. The oftener you paint the less paint is required and the more satisfying are the results.
