A Cardinal Sin.
CHAPTER IX. Continued.
MDLXX. FRANCESA.
For days and days the recollection of that beautiful face haunted him. He blamed his incapacity and weakness of address for not in some way ascertaining who she was, or at least the name she bore; for, in spite of her mysterious words, he feared that years might pass before chance brought him again in contact with her. Strange to say, the impression she had made upon him did not wear away; indeed, the true reason why, in the course of a fortnight, he left Redhill and returned to town, was the unspoken hope of encountering her again.

And the girl, on her side, as she was conducted to the carriage, almost regretted she had not asked her companion's name. He had been kind, attentive and considerate—he was a gentleman—he had talked to her sensibly, and made no absurd remarks, and above all he was the first Englishman she had spoken to on his native soil, as it were, for some three years, and he was very handsome. Such an agreeable contrast to the dark-eyed, olive-complexioned people she had been surrounded by for so long.
She would have asked his name had it not been for the family secrets he had disclosed to her which forbade such an indiscretion.

Well they might meet again or they might not; she had far more important things to think about.
A few weeks' time she was to make her attempt to rank high in the world of song. She was to stand before a critical audience and find out if success or failure was to be her portion—if her three years' hard work at her art had been rewarded—if the power of her voice was as great as judges, many of them severe judges, averred.
But until the ordeal she was going to stay with her friends the Tren-fields at their pretty villa on the Thames. Both Mr. and Mrs. Tren-field had insisted upon it being her home, at least for the present; and Frances Boucher, glad to think she had some friends in England, readily accepted the invitation.

She was cordially welcomed.
The Trenfields—father, mother and children—had during the short time she had been with them previously, learned to love her and to look upon her as one of themselves. They had not seen her during her absence from England; although a visit to Milan had been promised every year something had always prevented it. They were stay-at-home people—not of the modern travelling school. After the first greeting, and after Frances' unlucky maid had been sent to her room to sleep off the effects of the journey and recover at leisure her national vivacity, Mrs. Trenfield drew her guest under the lamp, for by this time it was dark.

"Now, my dear," she said, "let me look at you, and see what three years have done for you." Frances threw off her mantle and stood as requested. She had no reason for her inspection, even had less friendly eyes been making it.

What had the three years done for her? Changed her? No. Girls of her type change little; she was a woman at nineteen, and can be only a woman at twenty-two. Yet the three years have perfected every charm—they have given her even a more graceful and queen-like carriage; they have given her confidence; have taught her to meet the eyes of men and women fearlessly; to know that she can hold her own with the best of them.
The soft Italian air has not been prejudicial to her health—she is straight, large-limbed, and strong; the picture of what the mothers of a fine race of men should be. As far as appearance, disposition and constitution go, she has every element needful for success in a public career. So Mr. and Mrs. Tren-field looked at her with honest admiration, their daughters with pride at having such a splendid friend and their son a young fellow with shadowy whiskers, and an affection for the classics, was so whirled from his metaphorical feet that he could only keep on mis-quoting to himself some line about "Great Hebe's eyes."

Yet there was nothing severe about her beauty—nothing cold in her manner. She was above everything a true-hearted loving woman, with weakness enough to win the love of her own sex. She was at home in a moment with every one.
Tired by her journey—the downland a bit of it—she wanted to change her dress, bathe her face—and, yes, she did want her dinner.
In half an hour she was at the table with her friends, as fresh and blooming as when she left Dieppe at early morning.

She had been regular in corresponding with them all, so they knew all about her life in Milan.
She talked of the journey and how well she had managed alone. The two daughters looked at her with increasing reverence as they thought of her courage in coming to the distance without protection.
Mr. Trenfield apologized again for his inability to have kept his promise, and Charlie, his son, signified and wished he had been sent as a substitute. Such a chance, he thought sadly, comes to a man but once in a lifetime.

Children Cry for Pitcher's Castoria.

"Then you staid in Paris some time?" asked Mr. Trenfield.
"Yes; ten days. I had business there."
"Where did you stay?" asked the elder daughter, thinking a girl who staid alone in Paris was brave beyond her sex.
"At a nice, quiet, dull boarding-house. Nearly all the guests were old ladies and gentlemen. They were all very kind to me." Of course they were, thought Charlie.
"Now, may I ask," said Mr.
Trenfield, "what possible business you could have in Paris? Till you dismiss me I am your legal adviser, and have a right to know."
"I spent heaps and heaps of money—that's all I mean to tell you."
"Boarding-house charges so high then?"
"You stupid man!" said his wife,
"can't you guess her business?"
"Not a bit; but I hope it went off satisfactorily."
"Perfectly," said Frances. "Oh, they are such beauties! There is one too lovely to wear." The ladies quite flattered as she made this announcement.
"When shall we see them? Are they here?" asked one of the daughters.
"They will come with my luggage. I daresay it has come now.
We will look at them all to-morrow, and try them on."
"Women know with what pleasure to-morrow was looked for."
"Oh, I see," said Trenfield; dresses, eh?"
"No, sir, masterpieces—poems—works of art."
"Well, you are young and of course could not resist the temptation; that's where the money went, was it? Cost a lot, I suppose?" Frances laughed, drew out her purse, and shook two or three sovereigns on the cloth.
"See," she said, "see all the money I have left, and you know what you sent me."
"Phew! you are an extravagant young lady; you will corrupt my wife and daughters."
"No, I am a gambler putting down a heavy stake; or I am a woman of business investing capital. What I shall do with the things if I fail, I don't know. Mrs.
Trenfield must buy them at a great reduction."
"Ah," said Mrs. Trenfield, "but I wouldn't fail if I were you; if you do you will have enough to live on. Now there will be no difficulty in claiming your father's money; we will see about it at once."
Frances' face grew sad. Her father's mysterious death was the great trouble of her life. She had never wavered in her resolution to find George Manders and force him to speak. She knew Trenfield had heard no news of him, or he would have told her, but she felt sure they must meet some day.
The ladies went to the drawing-room, where Mr. Trenfield promised to join them after one small cigar, as the hour was getting very late.
Young Trenfield reflected about for a few minutes, then told his father, if he would excuse him, he would follow the ladies. Mr. Tren-field looked at him with a kind but a meaning smile on his face.
"I say, Charlie, my son, take an old man's advice. Don't you fall in love with Miss Boucher." Charlie blushed, and hung his head in boyish confusion, marvel-ling how the parental eye had read his thoughts so clearly.
"She is a good and a beautiful girl, and you are a very decent boy—I am proud of you; but try to remember that the probabilities are that in a few months she will have all society at her feet—that her name will be known all through England—so think what chance you have, and don't fall in love with her!"
