Gladstone on Beaconsfield.

On moving the grant for Beaconsfield's monument, Gladstone said that regarding his own conduct he had considered it his duty not to yield to the temptation to establish a new precedent for complimentary observances which might cause embarrassment in the future.

He thought there could not be a shadow of doubt in answering both questions in the affirmative. Despite the sharp change manifested at the late elections, the authority by virtue of which the late Lord Beaconsfield had acted emanated from the same franchise of a free concession as that which maintained the present Government, who endeavored with the same sincerity to promote the grandeur of the country.

Northcote, in seconding the motion, said that Gladstone had already erected a monument better than marble. In the House of Lords, Granville made a motion for the Beaconsfield monument, which was adopted without a division.

The wages and strike boom is rattling up and down the Grand Trunk from one end of the line to the other. Why doesn't the company make a big raid for popularity, and let the men, by increasing wages all round, instead of being forced into an advance by each branch of the service in succession?
