"Beaver Flour"

is the finest blend of the two best wheats Canada produces—Manitoba Spring wheat and Ontario Fall wheat. One provides the rich gluten that makes bone and muscle, the other gives lightness and whiteness to the bread and pastry. Beaver Flour makes more loaves to the barrel than any other flour on the market—loaves that are sweet, nutritious and light, and it also makes delicious biscuits, cakes and pies.

Try it, and show your friends the excellence of your baking.

CHAPTER XX.
Over the Toast and Tea.
(Concluded.)

HAROLD, with more than half his attention fixed on the white, slim figure at the piano, answered in the same tone, but very soon sank back and gave himself up to enjoyment.

"Ask her to sing," he whispered.

"Sing something, Miss Ethel, dear," said the dame aloud.

There was a moment's pause; then the exquisite voice rose softly into an old, English ballad.

Harold covered his eyes with his hands, and listened with all his heart. Never, in all his life, had a voice so touched him; and yet he had heard most of the great singers of the day, from Titens to Nilsson.

Sweetly and softly, the fresh, young voice sang the simple, old world song, with no straining after effect; no elaborate notes; no ear-piercing trills. It was just sweet, pure melody.

Without moving, Harold said, quietly:

"Once more, Miss Ethel," and was quite unconscious that he had called her by her Christian name.

With a little flickering color, she touched the notes, and sang another song, this time that immortal air from "Trovatore," which, hackneyed though it be, is always fresh and moving.

There was a moment's silence, when she had finished, and left the piano.

Harold thirsted for more, but could not summon up courage to ask for it.

Not a word did he say, but, as he rose and stood, hat in hand silent and abstracted, both might have seen that the weary, troubled look had left his face, and the old, frank, serenity had come back to it.

"With something like a start of reluctance, he said, looking at his watch:

"I'm afraid I must go; I'd no idea it was so late! Good-night, nurse!" and, with that unaffected simplicity which so well becomes a man, he bent his handsome head and kissed in his eyes, so quiet and grave, instead of bright and sparkling. They used to look so when anything crossed him or puzzled him, long years ago. My heart ached and yearned to ask him; but what could I do—a poor, old woman? And he'd have put me off with a light word and a saucy one."

"He did not seem unhappy," said the quiet, musical voice, thoughtfully. "Why should he be? He is young, handsome—"

She paused; the dame nodded.

"Handsome—ay, that he be—my Harold!"

"And rich; with best of friends—"

"And a Woodleigh!" said the nurse, summing up; "that's enough to make a man happy. What was it he said about Miss Lillian, dear? Ah, I want you to see her! Talk about handsome, now! There's a beauty, bless her heart!"

Ethel struck a chord or two, softly.

"Tell me about her," she said, in a low voice. "Is she so very beautiful? What is she like?"

"She's lovely, Miss Ethel, dear; and what's she like? Ah, how can an old woman like me put it into words? She's an angel!"

"Is she dark or fair?" asked Ethel, playing a soft, floating melody.

"Dark, my dear; but not one of your black women! Oh, no! Dark, with the loveliest hair, and eyes that shine like diamonds when you look at them one moment, and look soft and smooth as a fawn's the next. And such a beautiful mouth! Not small, like a doll's, but with reddest lips and the prettiest curves. Ah! and the old dame paused a moment, musingly; "I've seen some beauties in my day, Miss Ethel, but none so beautiful as Miss Lillian."

"How happy she must be!" murmured the listener, her words scarcely audible above the soft music.

"Happy! Yes; and so she should be, bless her heart, with everything to make her happy, and with a handsome husband waiting for her to name the day. What a pair they'll make, my Harold and her!"

The music died away, and the girl gazed across the room and sank down on the rug at the old lady's feet.

"And does he—does she love him?" "Love him!" echoed the dame, almost indignantly. "How could she help it? Who could help loving my handsome Harold! He that fetched her back to her own home too! But there; I've told you all about that till you're tired of hearing it."

"No, no," murmured Ethel, throwing one arm over the dame's knees and resting her head on it; "no, I am not tired. I like to hear you tell it, nurse. And she loves him—ah, yes, of course. And he—of course, he loves her!"

"Of course," nodded the dame. "Why, half the country's in love with her, small blame to them!"

"And does he talk about her—has he said so to you, nurse?"

"To me?" hesitated the dame, reluctantly. "Well, no, not in plain words. But, then, Master Harold isn't the one to talk much. Not he! He thinks the more, I'll be bound."

"I wonder," mused Ethel, "when they will be married?"

"Soon," replied the dame. "Old Sir Talbot won't be quite happy till they be. It's the hope of his life to see them two paired, and it's right they should be; the Woodleigh land and the Woodleigh money will go together then, as they should do. I pray as I may see the day, Miss Ethel. I'll go to the church, if I have to be carried there. I fancy I see her, all in white, with the family diamonds shining on her! It will be a sight worth seeing! The diamonds haven't seen the light since Lady Woodleigh went, poor soul!"

"Poor lady!" murmured Ethel. "It is a sad story. If she could only have lived!"

"Ah!" sighed the dame. "The gentlest, simplest creature you ever saw! And all so timid and frightened of Sir Talbot. Not one of us servants as didn't understand him better than she. Poor soul! Well, well, that dreadful time is all forgotten now, and her child has come to her own again. Shall I get a light, Miss Ethel, dear?"

"No—no," came the soft, low answer; "not yet. Tell me something more about Mr. Woodleigh, nurse; you—you are sure he is very fond of his cousin Lillian? Yes, she must be very happy!"

The dame, only too ready, comed over the old, old story of Harold's courage and generosity; of how he had performed this feat, and accom-
