supremacy as the leading operator of ships is shown by the current reports of the world's shipping business. The annual Register Book compiled by Lloyd's shows that the merchant navies of the whole world now include 33,507 vessels with an aggregate tonnage of 65,166,238. It also appears that while the latter figure has increased by nearly 33

256,766 tons to 19,281,549 tons. If we consider only sea-going steamers and motor vessels of steel or iron construction as being the importance, says Engineering, in its eview of the report, we find that the world's total tonnage has increased in the same period, and in round figures, from 42,514,000 tons to 57,939,000 tons, the difference of 15,425,000 tons representing an in-Cabinets is seldom thus punctuated, crease of 36 per cent. Of this class of shipping, 19,077,000 tons are now owned in Great Britain and Ireland, as compared with 18,877,000 tons in June, 1914, the difference of 200,000

The one significant fact in the whole report is that British ships are the busiest in the world. They are six times busier than the ships of other nations. There are at the moment 12,000,000 idle tons in the world, and only 711,000 of these are in British ports. So, roughly speaking, England has one-third of the ships on the high seas, and only one-eighteenth of the idle-
