HUNGRY HEARTS.

Some hearts go hungering through the world
And never find the love they seek;
Some lips with pride or scorn are curled
To hide the pain they may not speak.
The eye may flash, the mouth may smile,
The voice in gladdest music thrill,
And yet beneath them all the while
The hungry heart be pining still.

I see them gaze with wistful eyes,
I mark their sign on fading cheeks;
I hear their breathe in smothered sighs,
And note the grief that never speaks;
For them no night redresses wrong,
No eye with pity is impelled;
O, misconstrued and suffering long!
O, hearts that hunger through the world!

For you does life's dull desert hold
No fountain shade, no date grove fair,
No gush of waters clear and cold,
But sandy reaches wide and bare.
The foot may fail the soul may faint,
And weigh to earth the weary frame,
Yet still ye make no weak complaint,
And speak no word of grief or blame.

O, eager eyes which gaze afar!
O, arms which clasp the empty air!
O, souls which yearn for love and rest,
O, hearts which hunger through the world!

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

To ascertain how far the name of Spens was compromised in the eyes of the citizens, and if possible to discover the chances of obtaining audience with the Queen, he at length sallied forth. Her ladyship had gone to rest, and the faithful old servant Andrew remained to watch over her.

The snow, trodden hard by men and horses, rendered walking somewhat dangerous, and the faint light given by the feeble oil lamps scarcely served any purpose beyond that of showing the dense white fog which had gathered over the city on the hill. This was the night for careful burglers to coddle themselves up at their firesides and to keep safe within doors; for convivial burglers to share the jest and gossip of the tavern kitchen, and to become a prey to lurking foot-pads as they staggered homeward.

Gilbert turned up Blackfriars' Wynd, and he observed as he passed the Chancellor's house that there were busy doings within, judging by the illumination of the windows. And, in truth, there were busy doings, for Hamilton, Earl of Arran, had arrived that afternoon and taken up his quarters with Archbishop Beaton; and as he was accompanied by his chief kinsmen and officers, with a fair number of retainers and common followers, there was much bustle and feasting in the house.

Gilbert proceeded up the Wynd, and as he emerged into the High Street a detachment of the City Guard passed without perceiving him. He turned towards the Cross, and presently entered the hostelry of St. Andrew's Rest.

The change from the darkness of the street to the bright light of the tavern was so sudden that for a minute he could discern nothing beyond a confusion of voices and a crowd of men.

He soon became accustomed to the change however, and discovered that the company was composed of soldiers, drovers, and citizens' divided into groups, each gossiping of its own special topic of interest. An enormous fire burning on the hearth gave the chamber warmth and an air of comfort despite the wetness of the unflagged floor, upon which the snow from the guests' feet dissolved as it was shaken off, and slowly became absorbed in the earth, or formed in a tiny pool in some hollow place. Sundry flasks of bacon hanging from the roof indicated broadly that hungry men with a few groats in their pockets need not remain long unsatisfied.

The neat-handed fat-faced hostess speedily served Gilbert with a flagon of mulled wine, and seating himself at the end of one of the tables he sipped and listened.

He did not wait long before the matter which interested him was touched.

A ferret-eyed fussy little man in snuff brown garments broke the ice by demanding of one of the soldiers if he had been at Flodden.

There was a lull in the conversation of all those who heard the question, and although all fear of an English invasion was past, although the people had already begun in some degree to recover from the shock of the ill-fated battle, the mention of it was yet sufficient to call forth sorrowful and sorrowful waggings of heads.

'Ay, master, I have been there,' was the soldier's response, 'an' I'm no proud to say that I have come back again.'

'An' were ye near the King?' with loyal eagerness queried a brawny northern cattle drover.

'Sir,' said the fussy little man, looking at the northern man with dignified reproval, 'I'm Deacon Simpson, and I'm speaking to this gentleman.'

'Atweel, man, I didna say that ye was na speaking till him.'

'No, I was na near him,' said the soldier, 'but I am tauld that some traitor's cantrips lost the day for us and made awa' wi' the King.'

'And wha was the traitor?' demanded the drover.

'I cannat tell ye that. Some say Lord Home but I'll no believe that.'

Deacon Simpson looked as if he could have enlightened them on the subject, but would not.

'Maybe ye ken, Maister Deacon,' suggested the soldier.

'I'm no sure; but I could tell ye wha has taen suffer for't, whilk would no be a bad indication o' wha was the traitor.'

'Wha is to suffer?' queried several.

'Is it Wat Spens?' queried others.

The deacon pressed his lips and looked mysterious.

'I'm very sorry, neighbors, but I cannat answer ye.'

'Then I will,' said a man at the further end of the table in a loud voice.

All eyes were turned upon him, and despite his disguise as a common drover, Gilbert recognised Tushielaw, and at the same time became aware that the jovial visaged man who sat beside the borderer was scanning his features with pressed lip narrowly. He raised his cup to his lips, thereby concealing his features to some extent.

The deacon methodically scratched his head and examined the borderer with the air of a sage puzzled.

'An' wha may ye be, sir, that speak wi' sae muckle authority?'

'Do you want to know the name of the villain who betrayed our King?' said Tushielaw fiercely, looking around and unheeding the representative of civic authority.

'Aye, tell us that if ye can,' cried the company.

'Then it was Wat Scott of Halstead.'

Gilbert sprang to his feet with the impulsive resolve to throw back the lie in the man's teeth. But there was a murmur of rage and hate from all parts of the room which checked him. There was no surprise in the murmur, only bitter execration. The name of Sir Walter Spens had already been publicly pronounced as that of the traitor upon whose shoulders was laid the burthen of all the misfortunes of the recent struggle.

Gilbert turned sadly away, paid his score to the hostess and left the house. It would have been worse than useless to have attempted there to defend his friend.

As he passed from the hostelry, and whilst the goossips still groaned with rage at the tidings they had received, Tushielaw turned quickly to his companion, and said in an undertone—

'Was that our man?'

The other nodded affirmatively.

'Friends, and you have allowed him to go.'

'But not far—he is at the door still. I am ready.'

'He must not escape us, come what will.'
