CHAPTER XX.

"And dimna show yersel' at ony ither, time," counselled Mrs. Rendal, as they parted at the lodge gate. "It may just be as weel for the Captain and Nathan Garrett no to see ken that ye are bidin' wi' Matthew Greigson's."

"You are right," said George. "Let them suppose I have left the neighborhood, and Lillias may thereby be rendered more free in her motions. I shall keep close, Mrs. Rendal, depend upon it."

He went out by the gate, and, with a backward wave of his hand, departed along the snowy road. Mrs. Rendal stood gazing after him for a moment, then she turned and went away up the avenue with the letter for Lillias in her bosom.

"Wae's me," she murmured, as she slowly picked her footsteps, "there's an awfu' storm comin'—an awfu' storm. I'm feared to think about it; and heaven only kens hoo things will turn."

A light and buoyant heart had George as he made his way back to the cottage. Lillias's letter, so warm and so loving, had lifted him into a happy region. Hope seemed to hover over them still, notwithstanding the adverse position of affairs. The meeting which he had now to look forward to seemed something full of promise—pleasant anticipation, which would make the days of waiting pass lightly and agreeably.

One question, specially occupied him during this return walk. Should he write an account of what had transpired to Harry and Caroline? Since his coming to Ardgowan, he had kept them acquainted with all his thoughts and feelings—of his growing love for Lillias, whom he described in terms of ardent enthusiasm—the beauty of her person, the still greater beauty of her heart and mind—the charming frankness with which she had received him, the kindness she had constantly shown him, and the growing closeness of their intercourse. All this he had communicated without reserve or restraint. It was natural, therefore, that now he should inform them of the crisis which had so suddenly come—its peculiar character, and the extraordinary position in which matters stood.

But somehow he hesitated about doing this. He had an aversion to put in writing a description and report of the scene in arbour. Its first part was too sweet and sacred, and its last too discreditable, for the subject of a letter. He would probably be with Harry and Caroline soon, and his lips be able to tell them of the strange events. So, for the present he resolved to remain silent, and surprise them by his unlooked for arrival.

The question settled thus, the mind of George reverted wholly to Lillias and her letter, and here feelings of delight alone glowed in his soul. Her love for him was proving stronger than any mere instinct of filial obedience. She had no intention of giving him up without a struggle—a struggle, it might be, altogether hopeless, yet manifesting not the less the truth and loyalty of her affection. The value of this depth and fullness of love was to George most strengthening. The exultant and defiant feeling of the previous night returned to him, and even in greater measure, so that when he strode down the bridge path and met Matthew Greigson coming up with the intention of looking for him, his elastic step and free joyous bearing filled the old man with happy surprise.

George soon told him what had occasioned his flow of good spirits, and as Matthew listened his eye kindled with a pleasant glance.

"Just so, sir, just so," he remarked. "When I saw ye coming doon sae canny I thought it was the frost making your young blood dance in your veins. Nay, for a moment—so pleased and glad did ye look I thought the Captain had relented, and all had come right, though well I might have known that could not be possible. But we have cause enough, sir, to be proud and happy. The love o' a noble, true-hearted lassie like Miss Lillias may well make any man light-hearted even in adversity."

"Especially one in my station and circumstances," added George. "What had I to recommend me to her regard?"

"What had you?" repeated Matthew. "Everything that a lassie like Lillias Gibson could prize or admire."

"Not so, my friend," returned the youth, with earnest seriousness. "Many girls—most girls, I should say—would have looked with indifference, if not contempt, on their brothers' tutor—poor, obscure and unfriended. But Lillias was kind from the first."

"Because she had sense enough to see your character and worth."

George smiled and shook his head. "I am content. He had no desire to pry too minutely the prompting cause of Lillias's affection. The fact was too blessed in itself to be traced in wonder to its source."
