MUNYON'S DYSPEPSIA CURE

When Prof. Munyon says his Dyspepsia Cure will cure indigestion and all forms of stomach trouble he simply tells the truth. It will cure a stomach that has been abused by over-eating and over-drinking. It will cure a stomach that has been weakened by old-style drugs. It will do much toward maxing an old stomach act like a sound one. At all druggists, 25 cents. Fifty-six other cures, Munyon, New York and Philadelphia.

ELSIE.

She looks like a nobler Queen Elizabeth, thought Elsie, with all that great queen's energy of intellect joined to the soul of a saint. As for the young lady, Elsie shivered a little as she looked at her. She was unique, a lovely woman, but there was an unearthly, uncanny element in her loveliness—clever, oh, so clever, Elsie was sure of it, and haughty as a Russian or a Spanish princess. Who was shewith those intensely blue eyes, the very color of the summer sky, and those long, thick black lashes and dark pencilled brows, and that short, scornful upper lip—and, wonder of wonders, with those masses of perfectly flaxen hair, contrasting so strangely with the dark eyebrows and lashes?

She was very handsome: her complex-She was very handsome; her complexion was like alabaster, with the tint of wild roses on her cheeks, and her lips were coral-red and her nose a delicate equiline. But Elsie searched in vain for one soft gleam of womanly tenderness; the face was too narrow to be perfectly beautiful, and the lips were too thin. The young lady was graceful, tall, and slender, holding herself erect, and looking down, so it seemed to Elsie, on the world in general.

"Is this girl Lady Marjorie? If she is I can never like her."

The young lady was attired in a gown of purple velvet, made in the most finished Parisian style; around her long throat cose a high white lace ruff, a short chain of pure dead gold at her girdle was her puly ornament.

"I didn't hear you, Lady Chase. I never hear a sound when I have my chakspeare before me."
"But you should not study too much, my dear Pauline. You are looking overtired, as if you had wearled yourself with brain work."

brain work."

A look—was it alarm or annoyance?—shot into those very blue eyes of the flaxen-haired girl for a moment. Ther she laughed a pretty slivery laugh, and showed her even white teeth.

"You forget that to study is my recreation. You forget how little time I have had to devote to it hitherto. Dear Lady Chase, don't check me; let me study. I am happier here than with your gay guests—indeed I am."

"Well, and I suppose it is pleasant to guests—indeed I am."

"Well, and I suppose it is pleasant to study the part of Ophelia here in this old Tudor hall. You could fancy you heard Lord Hamlet's step coming down the cloister behind those suits of armor. And the ghost, too!"

The young lady laughed again. This time her laugh sounded shrill and unpleasant.

time her laugh sounded shrill and unpleasant.

"The ghost? That is the only part of the play with which I have no sympathy.
Of course one must allow for the ignorance and superstition of the times in which Shakspere wrote, but if I had my way I would have all those elements of the supernatural taken out of the new editions of his works."

"And that hint to Horatio, 'There are more things in heaven and earth Horatio

And that hint to Horatio, There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamed of in your philosophy.' Would you suppress that, with all the speculative thought attendant in its train."

"I would," cried Pauline, with a smile on her lips that did not flash into her eyes, "I would. I do not care for those speculative portions of my favorite author. I have a dislike to the idea of the supernatural. It is so puerile, so redolent of the dark ages, it makes me laugh."

Lady Chase only smiled again faintly It was but a half smile, Elsie thoughtone that meant "I could never make this young person understand what the term supernatural means to me and to the supernatural means to me and to the class of thinkers, or perhaps one should say speculative dreamers, whom I admire and sympathize with." Elsie read, in fact, the exact thought that ran in the mind of the countess, for there was a certain affinity between this soul of the schoolgirl—half daring, wholly sympathetic with all that was true or noble, as with anything that pathetic with all that was true or noble, as with anything that suffered, with everything that was oppressed—and the soul of her ladyship, Clara, Countess of Chase.

"I will leave you, then, to your studies, Miss Bracegirdle," the countess said, "but first let me introduce to you Miss Elsle first let me introduce to you Miss Elsie Carew, who has come to spend the vacation with us at Charteris."

Handsome Pauline Bracegirdle raised her penciled brows in what looked to Elsie like a superlative disdain. She bent her handsome head to the schoolgirl, who immediately fired up, and, holding her pretty head aloft, bent it in the stateliest fashion to the other lady; and Pauline, turping away, began to chatter to the countess of other things—of the visitors staying in the house, of the private theatricals that were to come off in the second week of the new year.

"We shall not attempt Shakespeare." she said. "Only one or two of all your guests are capable of really appreciating him. But we are going to act 'Mademoiselle Renee,' adapted from the French—a delicious piece of sarcastic humor—delightful! I am sure you will be enchanted."

"Doubtless, if you act in it," returned the counters kindly: the

'Doubtless, if you act in it," returned the countess kindly; then she made a sign to Elsie to follow her.
Elsie accompanied the great lady, who was sweet and gentle as some saintly nun of high birth whom one has read of history, up the wide carven oak stairs and across a richly-carpeted gallery lined with paintings, toward a dark, polished door.

"You shall look at our pictures another time, my child; but now I know you must be hungry, and I want to show you your room. I made up my mind last night, when I heard the story of your being left alone to pass the holidays, that you should come here if you would, and I arranged for you to have the I arranged for you to have this

Elsie felt speechless with gratitude as the countess turned the handle of the door and led the way through a short of statue room into another and smaller corridor. At the end of this was a small round room, furnished cheerfully in bright-colored cretonne, pale blue ground with pale pink rosebuds. The pretty bed was hung with curtains of the same pattern; the chairs and couch were covered with the same; there was a large window in a recess, draped with the like chaste material, and this window looked over the flower garden, which Elsie had lot seen until now. The smooth gravel walks wound in and out amid hedges that in summer were abloom with roses of all hues; beyond were level lawns, bordered with flower beds; at the foot of this wide space was a dense wood of elms and beeches. Elsie felt speechless with gratitude as elms and beeches.
"It must be lovely in summer," said

Elsie.

"Does that mean that it is dreary now?
Well, the English climate is depressing in winter, but we will make up for all that indoors. We will be so gay, and if you would like to take a part in these theatricals you may."

"May I?" cried Elsie. She clasped her hands in an exclasy for a moment. "May I?" cried Elsie. She clasped her hands in an ecstasy for a moment; then she said: "I used once to fancy I should like to act for my living, but I have altered my mind; still, I should like to act fust once, to see what I could do."

"You shall," said Lady Chase. "But now take off your wraps, and when you are ready to come down ring that bell and Anderson, my maid, will come and shew you to the dining room; you will find me there at lunch."

Left alone, Elsie sat down and confessed to herself that this adventure was more like a lary story than ever. The unreality of the whole circumstance seemed to press on her like a nightmare. Aunt Johanna, away at Cannes, hew she would rejoice if she knew that Elsie was positively a guest of the Earl and Countess of Chase, at Charteris Court! How their wives, who formed the monde at the comparatively cheap pension! How she would boast to the other genteel spinsters, the half-pay captains and she would boast, to be sure, if ever it came to her ears!

"The countess, my dear friend—the countess!" Ah! I can hear her saying it all," Elsie said to herself, with a certain little curl of the lip; "but the end of the story has not come yet, and I feel somehow that the end won't be like the beginning; I feel that I shall have enemies in this enchanter's castle. That girl with flaxen hair and thin lips is my enemy already. If she could have taken me by the shoulders and put me out at the door she would have done it; or, better still, she would have liked to bring me up here and push me out of the window. A she would have done it; or, better still, she would have liked to bring me up here and push me out of the window. A horrible young lady, I feel sure of it. Fair as Becky Sharpe, and something like her, only a little prettier and more wicked. I ought not to think so, perhaps, but I seem to know it somehow. How fond she said she was of Shakespeare! Who can she be?"

Then Elsie took off her wraps, smoothed her fringe of dark, curly hair, bathed her face, washed her hands, and, going to where a china bowl with winter flowers stood in a recess, she took out a spray of holly and a blossom of lauristinus, and fastened them against her brown velvet gown. Then she rang the bell, and soon there appeared a tall, pale person, with a quiet face, a long black gown, and a small, tasty pink cap.

a quiet face, a long black gown, and a small, tasty pink cap.

This was Anderson, the favorite and confidential maid of the countess. The moment her brown, quiet eyes had searched Elsie's face she smiled kindly. "Lunch is quite ready, Miss Carew," she said, "and the countess is in the dining room."

Elsie went down the wide stairs, feeling more in a dream than eyer.

Elsie went down the wide stairs, feeling more in a dream than ever.
What was going to happen to her?
Nothing, most likely. She would be in a crowd, and nobody would take any notice of her. Only the countess would smile at her. She would lose her individuality in that crowd. She would sit moping—abashed, unnoticed, in fact.
Elsie lost all her courage suddenly when she found herself in a sort of inner hall of carved oak, with painted ceiling when she found herself in a sort of inner hall of carved oak, with painted ceiling, and high church windows of stained glass. There was a heavy rosewood door, through which came the sound of voices and the faint clink of silver.

Anderson turned the handle of this door, and Elsie found herself in a long room, paneled with oak and olive-colored velvet. There was a great table, at which some forty guests were seated; flowers, china, silver, crystal, all gleamed in the wintry sunshine streaming in through a large bay window, draped with curtains of dark claret satin. Footmen were handing dishes about. As for the guests, Elsie felt inclined to hide herself from their scrutiny and to retire. Then the voice of the countess reached her as she stood abashed by the door.

"Bring Miss Carew here, next to Lady Marjorie."

Another moment and Elsie was seated

[Daily Transcript, Moncton, N. B. Aug. 30, 1901.] The Rev. Henry R. Rose, in addressing the general passenger department has the following kind remarks to make about the Intercolonial and its "This is a beautiful region of our continent, and I shall lecture upon it in terms of highest praise. I was especially struck with the excellent equipment of your passenger coaches -better than anything we have in the States, save one or two exceptions. Also with the fine service of your dining cars. My trip to Campbellton was highly interesting. The Metapedia region is a sportsman's paradise, and an artist's too. The sportsmen and travelers of the States shall hear my voice in ringing praise of the region. My one regret is that I did not have leisure to visit Cape Breton this time. Hope to come again."
