The old fend then is happily buried; the hearts of the Anglo-Americans are manifestly turning again to their mother country; and as the Germans are emigrants of ha hos between which and England there is a fast friendship, Great Britain has now no enemies on this continent except the Irish, whose antagonism is not to her only but to Anglo-Saxon civilization. But the best of revolution or ators has now to squeeze an orange which has been squeezed by a hundred orators before, and which to tell the truth never was full of juice; for the heroism of the American revolution was not unlimited; it fell very far short of that displayed by the Dutch in their sixty years' struggle against Spain.

THE COLONIAL QUESTION.

In his work on the "Expansion of England" " Professor Seeley's political moral, put into definite form and current phrase, is imperial federation.

"GREATER BRITAIN."

Nor will the want of real unity be supplied by casting over the whole of the scattered and heterogeneous multitude of dependencies the dragnet of a collective lame, such as "Greater Britain." That lame is not applicable to India, as Profestor Seeley seems aware. His exclusive reame is not applicable to India, as Profestor Seeley seems aware. His exclusive regard for political aggregations under the tway of Downing street preventing him from seeing that morally he may have a real "Greater Britain" in the reviving affection of the people of the United States for the ancient home of their race. It is not applicable to Mauritius or any of the military dependencies; barely applicable to the negro-peopled West Indies, to South Africa, where the British are but a section of the European population which is itself of the European population which is itself greatly outnumbered by the natives; or even to French Canada, the nationality of which is not as Professor Seeley supposes dying out and ceasing to stand in the way of British consolidation, but on the contrary becoming more intense and territrary becoming more intense and territorially gaining ground, the vital force of British Canada being insufficient for its assimilation. No verbal generalization will impart likeness to things radically different properties. ferent from each other, or make it politic to deal with them in the same way.

will impart likeness to things radically different from each other, or make it politic to deal with them in the same way.

EMANCIPATION'S THE WORD.

Tho colonies instead of being lost by emancipation would be retained and perhaps improved for all purposes of usefulness and of a really grand ambition. Their attachment to the mother country would not be diminished; probably it would be increased, as it has certainly grown with their progress in self-government; and they would afford just as good homes as ever to the British emigrant. The privelege of controling their commercial policy in her own interest England has already resigned. Even of the political connection, that part which alone is genuine and abiding, mutual citizenship might, and it is to be hoped would, remain as before, To the colonies themselves the change would be merely the crowning of an edifice of self-government already in substance complete. Professor Seeley wastes words in proving that American prosperity is not the consequence of secession but of qualities manifested by the people before that event, combined with the natural wealth of the country. But in the natural wealth of secession but of qualities manifested by the people before that event, combined with the natural wealth of the country. But independence gave America national life, without which what a mass of pork and pumpkin pie that community would be!

a review of the Canadian constitution, with reference to the relation between the dominion and the provinces, written for the satisfaction of some persons who desired his lordship's opinion on the expediency of applying Canadian home rule to Ireland. Statesmen might as well provide the Irish people with Canadian snowshoes as extend to them the Canadian constitution. Lord Lorne is right in saying that there has been a constant tendency, under confederation, Lorne is right in saying that there has been a constant tendency, under confederation, to the increase of the central power: he is wrong if he thinks that this is certainly conducive to the stability of the federal system. The stability of the federal system. The stability of the federal system depends not on the stability of the central authority but on the freedom from dangerous tension which attends the secure enjoyment of local liberties. The danger of Canadian confederation at this moment is the abuse by Quebec of her practical possession of the central power. As becomes an exgovernor-general, his lordship talks a good deal of gentle optimism, and shows that a British nobleman enthroned in Rideau Hall sees Canada from a balloon. In a balloon indeed he would have no courtiers to mislead him about the sentiments of the people.

THE DOMINION MUST BE PRESERVED.

In the "Topics of the Week," the editor says of the Northwest situation:
Not wholly from the real grievances of the settlers, but in part from the seductive suggestions and loudly-expressed sympathies of those who would turn their grievances into political capital comes all the angry talk of secession—of annexation. Vain is this talk, we believe; but it is injurious. Young as the confederation is, we may congratulate our selves that the central power is pretty firmly established, and could muster to its support; were it or the integrity of our union seriously menaced, most of the best men of the country, conservative and reformer alike.
