PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S VIEWS

The President of the United States, in the course of his western tour visited the city of Detroit—where, by the way, he reviewed, and complimented, a body of Canadian volunteers, the Essex Fusiliers. Speaking on Monday last to the Spanish war veterans, as a former leader of the Rough Riders, he said: "This convention must bring up memory after memory."

"We had much to learn at first. At San Antonio, I was joined by a young fellow of excellent family and good spirits. He wanted to fight then and there—that was what he had come for; and he wasn't inclined to wait. He had much to learn also. He came to me and said: 'Colonel, I came to fight the battles of my country, and they treat me like a serf. They have set me to digging kitchen sinks.' His captain was a big fellow from New Mexico, and said that the young fellow of good family should keep on digging sinks. (Laughter). There was much hard drudgery, and the way a man did the drudgery showed how he would fight. A man who won't dig kitchen sinks would be what our Southern friends call 'plumb sick.' I wouldn't want to trust to his having the real stuff in a crisis.

"There's a lesson we can learn also in civil life: You will be a good citizen on the terms you'll be a good soldier—by doing well the duty of the hour and day, be it great or small. That's one of the lessons taught by our experience in the war. Another, that of treating a man according as he behaves, in the particular sphere in which he does his duty. All we care for is, did he do this duty? If he did, we are for him; if he didn't we are not for him. I like the way our young men went into the ranks from all callings and learned the lesson of equality and brotherhood. It was a good thing for the fellow who was brought up softly to learn the rough side—he learned it. Even on shipboard, I hear, there were some of your comrades from Detroit [the war ship, 'Yosemite,' was principally manned by Detroit men, naval volunteers], who found difficulty in getting his food down far enough. Some of you remember that in marching at 10 a.m. the blanket became heavy and you were tempted to throw it away; and at 10 p.m. you wished the blanket were two.

"There is a story—perhaps it is not true—of the Michigan men on the 'Yosemite.' When you sent your naval
