whom; whether from misconduct misfortune; let the unprejudiced public judge, if from the former they have a right to expect the inadequate atonement of the destructive head, which has sacrificed so many protecting hands; if from the latter, he may claim their pity and forgiveness: at all events, however, the fate of war was indubitably decided by the facrifice of those troops; the confequences which might eafily be foreseen, from the total loss of a whole army, immediately followed; our posts at Ticonderoga, &c. were exposed to imminent danger, and the victorious enemy, besides the diminution of our force, and possesfion of our arms and artillery, acquired the countenance of a powerful ally, and the affiftance of a formidable fleet.

I

th

m

CO

ed

A

m

H

ha th

un

att

un

The Military History affords numberless examples of the escape of troops surrounded by superior numbers. The army under General Cates, composed of Militia