GOING TO THE BAD.

BE ROMUND TATES. CHAPTER XVIII. THE AVENCER.

The hostile meeting between Colone Willamette and Sir Frederick Randall of which the former had spoken. lightly, had not been arranged with little difficulty as the colonel made friend. Wilbur Hoys. Not that Sir Frederick was any less reedy to quarrel, or even to push the quarrel to any axtremity, than his would-be antagonist: but it is probably more difficult to arringe for a duel in England than any er country in the world, and this arises from the fact that the few personal encounters of late years have been things to be laughed at rather than wept over, and that a considerable amount of ridicule is stached to the were idea of a duel.

Sir Frederick Randall, who was, like most men, without any sense of humor, loomly susceptible to the thought of being ridiculed, was equally susceptible to the punctilio of his rack. His moral character might be as bad as people said it was, but he had the dignity of his position to uphold, and it would be impossible, he felt, for him to go out with stene unknown man whose social status

Moreover, another fatal source, of inwas to be found in the reso-colored domino hanging on his am.
