THE PRIDE OF LLEWELLYN

By Mrs. E. Southworth

her, she felt in honor bound to refrain from exposing the agency of Allie in discovering the treachery. But the old minister not having the key to the mystery, simply thought that Gladys was a little touched in the brain. "Well, sir," said Mrs. Llewellyn as soon as Gladys had finished her narrative, "and what do you think of that?" "I do not know what to think of all this, madam. I must take time to reflect. But of one thing I am sure—that the young lady is no fit subject for matrimony, and that, therefore, I have no further business here," said he feeble old man, rising and preparing to depart. "Oh, sir!" exclaimed Gladys, starting up and clasping her hands in agony. "Do not quite desert my cause! It was not for this that

I came before you! It was to appeal to you for help, for deliverance! There must be some power, some where, that is able to free me the control of a false guardian! 'There is an Orphans' Court, is there not?' Oh, sir, only try to procure for me a hearing from the Orphans' Court and I will thank and bless you forever." "My good child," said the old man doubtfully, "I married your grandmother, and I married your mother, and I almost married you. And I would do anything in reason for you, for I pity you very much. But in this case I really do not know how to proceed. On the one hand, it seems only just that an orphan girl should have a hearing before the Orphans' Court if she should desire it, for that court was established for her benefit. But, then, on the other hand it seems insulting to this lady to appear from her authority, for she is a lady of the highest standing in character and position, and she the guardian selected for you by the will of your late lamented parents. And as such you are bound to obey her. I think, my dear child that you had better submit yourself to her guidance, for she really seems to have your interests very much at heart—yes, even to the extent of taking you for her daughter-in-law, notwithstanding misfortunes that might precede any less just and generous woman from doing so. Be patient my child. It is all for your good." "For my good?" For my good to be separated from my own husband! for my good to be dragged until my heart and brain are both softened that I have neither will nor intellect enough to save me from crime and ruin! For my good to be forced or betrayed into a felonious marriage with a half idiot! If you consider these things for my good, Mr. Kellogg, you may go away and forget me; but other wise, in the name of Heaven and by the love you bore my parents, I adjure you, I implore you, inter vene to save me! procure me a hearing before the Orphans' Court!" exclaimed Gladys, dropping on her knees and seizing the hands of the minister in agony of supplication. "You distress me beyond measure, my dear child. These are but sickly fancies of yours. Your guardian is your friend. The medicines she gives you are to soothe your mind and heal your body. The marriage she proposes for you is to repair the wrongs done you by another. Your mother your guardian angel, could do no more for you than this excellent aunt is doing. Submit yourself to her," said the old man, trying to raise the unhappy girl to her feet.

"Oh, Father Almighty! is there no help in earth or heaven!" cried Gladys sinking down overwhelmed by despair.

"Sir," said Mrs. Llewellyn, "this must be a very painful scene to you. And as your presence only serves to excite my poor ward, perhaps you had better withdraw and leave her with me."

"Gladly, madam. Poor girl! Poor girl!"

"Of one thing I must beg to caution you, sir. It is not to say anything of the mad story told you by this unhappy girl, nor even of the true story related to her, in confidence by myself. In fact, I beg that you will not mention anything that has transpired here today, for it is very painful to have family affairs canvassed by the gossips of the neighborhood."

"I understand you, madam, and I will be discreet. Poor girl! Poor girl! I married her grandmother, and I married her mother, and I had nearly married her! And to think it has come to this!"

And as the old man departed, leaving Gladys once more in Mrs. Llewellyn's sole power.

CHAPTER XII

Life and Death. If you look upon the map of the United States, you will see a queerly-shaped peninsula lying between the Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean, and comprising the two counties of Worcester, in Maryland, and Accomac, in Virginia. Nothing but the boundary line between the two counties separates the two States. It was in Worcester County, in Maryland, on the Chesapeake, that the little seaside village, once called Rogues' Harbor, but now bearing another name, was situated.

And it was but a few miles distant across the boundary line, in Accomac County, Virginia, that the old, dilapidated mansion house that went by the name of Forest was located. It belonged to the impoverished family of Brant Stukely, of whom James Stukely was now the sole representative. This deserted and forgotten dwelling stood on a ruin in the wilderness. No public road passed near it, and the neighborhood around it was so sparsely settled that few human beings ever approached it, its very existence was ignored or unknown.

To this desolated home Mrs. Llewellyn, who loved luxury, sent first of all some very comfortable furniture. She sent this by steamboat, in charge of her dear mute, Jude, who landed on an obscure part of the Virginia shore, and conveyed it thence quietly by wagons to the old mansion.

And a week after that Mrs. Llewellyn and her maid Ennis, and her confidential maid Ennis, and having in charge the unhappy wife of Arthur Powis, who may seem strange and incredible that any young married woman should submit to such oppressions and outrages as Gladys endured at the hands of Mrs. Llewellyn. But—youthful, friendless, inexperienced, separated from her husband, bowed down by sorrow and further, subdued by sedative drugs—what could poor Gladys do? It was a dreary December night when they arrived at the Forest Lodge. And Gladys entered the doors of the old house as hopelessly, as submissionally as ever condemned criminals passed through the gloomy portals of a prison. For to her there seemed "No light in earth or heaven."

As soon as they settled in their new home, Mr. James Stukely departed for the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, and life at Forest Lodge resorted into the most dreary of all monotonous routines.

The small establishment consisted only of Mrs. Llewellyn, her unhappy wife and the two servants, Ennis and Jude.

Allie was no more numbered among the household. Mrs. Llewellyn had discovered her bringing letters from the post office to Gladys, and on that day the faithful maid disappeared. Silently the deaf-mute served the meals in the dining room; silently the maid servant performed her duties in the bedrooms; surlily Mrs. Llewellyn and Gladys met and parted at the table or the fireside. No one event worth recording transpired; not a conversation worth repeating happened. And thus the weeks of the great frost slowly passed away.

But if Gladys, depressed by monotony, saddened by bereavement, and tortured by anxiety, did not go mad, it was because she became gradually conscious of a circumstance that filled her heart with a vague delight and invested her life with a deep interest. In a word, she discovered that she was destined to become a mother. And from the time that she became certain of this fact her spirits revived, her appetite returned, and, despite the unpropitious circumstances, she grew almost happy and healthy. For Nature is a tender mother and skillful nurse, and she was doing her best for Gladys.

Anything For Peace.

"You always play the phonograph during meals!" "Yep!" replied Farmer Corntosse "That's that we care for the music but we want to do everything possible to keep the summer boarders from talking about the league of nations."

Pelted With Bouquets

Jinks—You look dreadfully battered. What's happened? Binks—Wife has been pelting me with flowers. Jinks—Why, that wouldn't mark you up in that manner. Binks—Oh, they were in the pots.

One of my little girls had straight hair, while the other had curly hair. The straight haired one was somewhat envious of her sister's ringlets, and often used to grumble because her own locks refused to curl.

One day the curly-haired one was grumbling about some fancied hardships, and her sister rebuked her thus: "Well, you know, you can't have everything and curly hair."

Bigger Business From Better Health

"WHAT is this notion you have about the health of employes?"

"It is no notion, but a great big idea that I got when on military duty. It is one of the biggest benefits that is going to result from the war."

"Well?" "What set me thinking was the report of the draft board. Forty per cent. of the men examined were turned down as medically unfit. These men were from all classes, and since they were mostly young men it stands to reason that a far larger proportion of our men would be in the 'unfit' class."

"We cannot help that." "That is just it. We must help it if we are going to build bigger business and get the production we are after. What is the use of spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on the extension of buildings and then fill them with men who are not in a condition of health to do a day's work?" "That is true. What was wrong with most of those culled out?"

"Twenty-five per cent. were incapacitated because of nervous disorders. Malnutrition, the doctors said, was the cause of their condition. That way from childhood, perhaps. Their blood was thin and watery and their nervous system starved. As a result they were easily tired and had no reserve force. They would catch cold easily and in fact be easy prey to any germ disease.

"What can we do?" "We can see that they get half a day a week for outdoor recreation, and I am going to recommend the use of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food to these men. You know what the Nerve Food did for me when my nerves gave out. If I have my way it is going to have a good try-out among the men, for there is nothing I know of that will build them up so well."

"You certainly should know after the condition you were in, for I sometimes thought you would never get around."

"There are other ways we can help the men by better working conditions, but these are included in these building plans."

"Bigger business from better health" is my motto, and I know Dr. Chase's Nerve Food is going to help me carry out this program. "Dr. Chase's Nerve Food is so universally used that you can obtain it from any dealer at 50 cents a box, 6 for $2.75, or from Edmanson, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto. The portrait and signature of A. W. Chase, M.D., the famous Receipt Book author, are on every box of the genuine.
