expressly change them. However this opinion, though not well grounded, is pretty general among the English inhabitants of this province.

And in the fecond place, they fay, that, fuppofing that the laws of England were not of courfe introduced into this province by the very conqueft itfelf and the fubjection of the country to the crown of Great Britain, yet that they have been expressly introduced by your Majefty's proclamation of the 7th of October 1763, in the words that have been mentioned in the former part of this report; in which your Majefty affures them, that they may confide in your Majefty's royal protection for the enjoyment of the benefit of the laws of England.

Advantages and difidvantages of the third method. The third method of fettling the laws of this province, by making the laws of England the general basis of them, and permitting the Canadian customs to continue with respect only to fome particular excepted fubjects, and this by a general reference to the French law-books in which those customs are contained, without attempting to enumerate and express them anew, would also be a very short and easy one to your Majesty's ministers and fervants both in England and in this province; and will be very agreeable and fatisfactory to your Majesty's British fubjects in this province. Yet it will be attended with the following inconveniencies.

> By preferving a confiderable part of the French law in the lump, or by a general reference to the French law-books that contain it, it will in fome degree keep up in the minds of the Canadians that reverence for the laws and lawyers of Paris, and that confequential opinion of the happines of being subject to the French government (as being that under which those laws may be most ably administered) which all perfons that are zealously attached to your Majesty's government would naturally with to see extinguished. But this objection will take place in a much less degree against this method, than against the last-mentioned, or second method, by which almost the whole body of the French laws would be revived.

> Further, if this third method of fettling the laws is purfued, fome of the Canadians will probably make the two following objections to it. They will fay, in the first place, that the whole body of
