gallows nothing is uttered but the truth. Jennie Bosschieter came to her death by "knock-out drops" adminis-tered, so the confessions say, by Mo-Allister, Death, Campbell and Kerr.

She died on their hands and for hours they drove around Paterson with her stiffening body in a carriage, supported on one side by Death, on the other side by McAllister.

The New Jersey statutes provide that when the crime of murder is comnitted in pursuit of a felony it is murder in the first degree. This crime was committed in pursuit of a felony.

here's a Dense Mystery as to Why Alvord is not Arrested-Man With Side Whiskers in It.

New York, 10ct. 26.—In apart-ments that cost $20 a month, on the third floor of a flat house in Harlem, live the father and mother of the wife of Cornelius L. Alvord, the defaulting bank teller. They are Mr. and Mrs. Charles Benedict. The Benedicts are simple folks and poor. They live with-in the salary paid the old husband as bookkeeper in a butchering establish-ment. Mr. and Mrs. Benedict have seen little of their only daughter in the last several years. She seldom came to see them, so it is asserted. In fact, the neighbors and friends of old Mr. and Mrs. Benedict thought them childless. They attributed the devotion they showered on each other to the fact that they had no children.

It was 12 years ago that Alvord mar-ried Jennie Benedict, then a handsome blonde girl of 23, living with her father and mother in East One Hundred and Twelfth street. Alvord was a setady, hardworking fellow, the fa-ther of the girl thought. Alvord was not known to have a single bad hab-it. Alvord's social ambition and his love of extravagance is believed to have taken root when he gave recep-tion to his bride in a flat in which they lived shortly after his marriage. All the officers of the First National Bank were invited to the reception. This, it is said, is the only time Cashier Reed and others of the bank officials ever saw or met Mrs. Alvord. Mrs. Alvord became ambitious socially shortly after her marriage. Alvord's business ambition changed to a social That he loved his wife was shown by the way he showered money
