An industrious youth finds little trouble An industrious youth finds little trouble in securing profitable employment; it is the one who neglects his work, that finds failt with mankind for not having a position open for him. Not one person in a hundred out of employment to-day can honestly say that he finds himself destitute for any other reason than because he has failed to work faithfully in the position he has held. Merchants do not employ help just to give employment to the needy; they pay wages to employes to work and to work faithfully, and the youth who thinks he is going to be paid for more work than he actually performs,

The boy who endeavors to do more than is expected of him, will find that it is that extra work that is making an impression on his employer. There are hundreds of men, both young and old, who seem to be imbued with the idea that the world owes them a living; they seem to think that it is only a question of time when some rich relative or benevolent old man is going to discover in them some hidden virtue which should be rewarded by a hand-some present of several thouby a handsome present of several thou-sand dollars in each, and, in anticipation of such a discovery, they go through life finding fault with the ill luck which at-tends them, only to arrive at the end of as the world regards them. It is a disagreeable thing to behold a strong, healthy young man making little if any effort to ward providing for his future.
