With many of the newer breeds, the first cross upon common, or grade ewes, often makes a great success, it has been found that subsequent crosses in the same lines have resulted in failure and disaster; subsequent crosses of Cotswold blood almost always prove a succession of successes. And the result is that in a very few generations, the Cotswold type is so firmly fixed that they may be depended upon to produce a uniform type. This is well understood and admitted in England, where breeders of Cotswolds find a ready sale for the rammambs for crossing upon Downs and other breeds to produce early matuing lambs.
