Henry Alien to J. J. Dixon & Co.: The un-pleasant features about present conditions in the Henry Alien to J. J. Dixon & Co.: The unpleasant features about present conditions is the unsatisfactory status of general business. It lacks life: dulness seems to be the rule. The transporting companies seem to be taxed to the utmost. The banks have an abundance of loanable capital, but the general surroundings are by no meant as pleasant. This situation is not confined to any particular section, but the exchanges during the past fortnight in every section, except that about Chicago and some of the cities of the south, show decreases from last year. Those who have watched these returns in the past have discovered that this has been the condition of affairs throughout the entire year, the exchanges in 1891 being almost uniformly below those of 1890. It is possible that the great disparity during the past two weeks are due to the fact that about this period a few weeks before the panic last November efforts were made to force collections in mercantile quarters and the results were shown in increased amounts represented in the clearing houses returns of banks, and since, the variety of the variety of the variety of the variety.
