CHAPTER IV.

THE INQUIRING HEATHEN-ZENOBIA. "Such, and far more excellent than I am able to describe, is the rule of Christian practice; a rule, in perfection, in beauty, in efficacy, far surpassing all other rules; productive of a goodness more complete, more lovely, more sprightful than any other doctrine or institution hath been or can be able to bring forth. Two words here,— Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself,' do signify more, do contain in them more sense and savour, to the judgment and relish of a well-disposed mind, than the Ethics of Aristotle, the offices of Cicero, the Precepts and Disin force and efficacy it doth also far excel them."-

Paul of Samosata-his perfidious predecessor-from the just displeasure of his ecclesiastical superiors. The undertaking, he knew, was a hazardous one; he had nothing to oppose to the power and intrigue of his adversary but integrity and the justice of his cause; yet he was by no means disheartened by the prospect before him. The incidents of the previous evening, which caused him amid the sorrows of his gray hairs to rejoice in the recovery of a long-lost child, were thankfully embraced by the aged prelate as a direct interposition of God in his behalf, and an encouraging pledge of the Divine Presence guiding his footsteps and hallowing his path. He was now assured, so far as hope could convey assurance, that his labours would be crowned with success; and in this conviction he felt prepared to go on his way rejoicing.

The road into which they entered from the bye-path which led to the cottage, was the thoroughfare between Palmyra and Damascus. It was thronged with caravans, either moving towards the city to discharge their precious freight, or returning from it after the delivery of their burthens. Each side was lined with villas. designed and built in the most graceful style of Grecian architecture, and adorned with all the exterior decorations that riches could purchase and the genius of that period invent. These were the property of the nobility or the wealthier class of citizens; and were separated by gardens which, in point of beauty, though not in grandeur, might almost have competed with those which Babylon received from the extravagance of her monarch. Such were the evidences of commercial enterprise on the one hand: the traces of military genius were equally obvious on the other. The city itself, about a mile in front, presented the appearance of a beleaguered fortress. It had been rumoured for some time moment, it had not become certain whether Palmyra or Persia were the point of attraction.
