some beautiful remarks on mutual recognition in a future state, and on the expectation of perfected blessedness. The discourse is ably conceived, and vigorously written, and will amply repay perusal."—Methodist Recorder.

"This discourse, like other productions from the pen of Mr. Crook, is distinguished by vigorous thinking and eloquence of style. While the author pays a just tribute to the gifts, labours, and personal excellence of Archbishop Whately, he successfully overthrows a notion to which Whately lent his great name—the unconsciousness of the soul between time of death and the resurrection—and proves, by a powerful array of Scripture evidence, that the soul in the separate state of being retains not only its vitality, but its consciousness, its power of thought, memory, reflection, volition, and emotion, unimpaired by the dissolution of the body, and immediately enters upon a state of happiness or woe."—Methodist New Connexion Magazine.

"This is a good and able Sermon, and is followed by a just and appreciative Sketch of Dr. Whately's public career."—Evangelical Witness.

"A valuable and most profitable contribution to the theological literature of Methodism."—Rev. John Rattenbury.

"The argument is very triumphant."—Rev. John Farrar, Secretary of the Conference.

"I have never seen this most important subject handled in such a masterly way, or to my mind so conclusively. The discourse is characterised by remarkable ability, and spirit-stirring eloquence."—John D—, Esq., Columbo, Ceylon.

"I have read this most admirable Sermon with intense interest, and much profit. It is a masterpiece."—Rev. Dr. Pickard, Sackville, New Brunswick.

"An eloquent and argumentative defence of the generally received doctrine of the intermediate state."—Christian Miscellany.

"The style is marked by a most agreeable combination of vivacity and strength; and we have only to observe, that in this respect this Discourse will not disappoint any. Language in which beauty and vigour are united, is employed to express truth of the loftiest character, in the most unequivocal terms. Your attention cannot fail to be fixed, as you read page after page; and, when you arrive at the end, you are at once sorry that it has been reached so soon, and thankful for the instruction and spiritual profit which you have received. The healthy tone of this book, both as regards the doctrine it teaches and the spirit it breathes, together with the ability displayed in the work, render it worthy of a very wide circulation."—Rev. N. R. in Irish Evangelist.

"A Discourse of great vigour, and of marked ability."—Rev. Dr. Morison, of Glasgow, Editor of the Evangelical Repository.
