UTILIZATION OF WASTE LUMBER Should be Made Available for Manual Training Graduates and Others

One of the serious wastes of saw and planing mills is the short lengths of lumber and narrow strips ripped from the edges of the larger material. It is customary to sell this for firewood, or burn it in refuse burners. This is only one side of the waste. In practically all the cities and towns of Canada for some years manual training has been taught in the schools. Thus, thousands of former pupils, now with homes of their own, are more or less capable of following up on teaching of their youth by producing the numerous articles which help to give that homelike touch to homes, and which are useful as well as ornamental. The manual training graduate has found, however, that his ambition to make things is seriously hampered by the difficulty and cost of securing the necessary material. To obtain short pieces of different dimensions he must either buy the entire board of each size and have them delivered, or he must have the pieces cut to the sizes required and practically pay the price of the full length material. This condition has discouraged the amateur cabinet-maker from applying his training. What would have developed into a hobby with many boys has been neglected, their instruction has been forgotten, the homes are bare of many novelties and much time which might be profitably employed is wasted. Between the supply and the consumer of these short lengths of lumber is a gap which it is possible to bridge, and the small pieces could be used by which the consumer obtain them at a moderate price.
