Fables On Health

SOCIAL PSYCHIATRY
SOCIAL psychiatry differs very much from "isylum," Mrs. Mann learned.
In the first place it teaches the recognition at the earliest stage, warning symptoms of nervous and mental disorder.
This, of course, means during childhood, because it is in this plastic, flexible period that the necessary wholesome habits of mental health can best be instilled, and faulty ones, pointing to impending disaster in later life, corrected.
Therefore the recognition and understanding that disagreeable, unhealthy habits and tendencies during childhood and excessive development of queer, warped or twisted personalities during the same period constitute early danger signals.
A person's personality usually is formed by the time the person reaches 13.

In the second place, social psychiatry teaches us to regard man as a single unit or entity. It insists that we look at the patient as a human being, from the whole point of view, with a knowledge of how he fits into his niche in life.

Adventures of the Twins

By OLIVE ROBERTS BARTON.

BIRD HOUSES.
Jack Frost had taken his long nose and his paint brushes and gone for good.
The little Raggy fairies under the ground had pushed and pushed at the roots of things until the grass and the green plants covered the whole earth.
And the blossom fairies had been so busy that trees were now sprinkled all over with funny buds and katkins.
And besides that there were yellow bushes out everywhere.
Mrs. Bluebird built her nest in a fence corner while fat, lazy Mister Bluebird watched her.
Mister Redbreast had a little more decency about him and did most of the nest building himself.
The March Hare and the Twins came along just as the last piece of straw was being put into place.
"I forgot!" exclaimed the hare. "I certainly did plumb forget."
"What's the matter?" asked Nancy. "What did you forget? Isn't spring started? Isn't everything all right?"
"It certainly isn't," said the hare. "I forgot about the bird houses. There are called out a little song sparrow from a high weed.

"And you needn't bother on our account," called a red-winged blackbird from a bush.
"And you needn't bother on our account," called a swallow from a barn roof. "We like a special kind of nest made of mud. Either that or a chimney."
"Or on my account," said Mrs. Flicker. "I hole in an old tree is good enough for me."
There were other birds who could also have said not to bother about them, but they had not yet come from the south. The meadow lark, for instance, would likely have said, "I build my nest on the ground."
And the blue jay would have said (if he were honest), "You needn't bother about me either, for I use the nests that other birds have built."
And the oriole would have said, "And as for us, we make a sort of pocket and hang it from a branch. No bird house for us, thank you!"
But, for all there were so many birds who didn't need houses, the March Hare knew that there were hundreds who did.
Mister Tinkling, the fairy landlord, took out his rent book, "I figure," said he, "that there are going to be at least 999 more bird houses needed this year than ever before. What had we better do?"
"We'll write to all the boys at once," said the March Hare, "and advertise in the papers."
The next morning every boy for miles and miles found a letter under his door. And all the papers in town told about bird houses being needed.

Pyjamas Now Bathing Suits

COPYING from the style started at Lido Beach, Venice, Italy, the first bathing girls of spring are wearing pyjamas as bathing suits. Here's one of the noblest styles snapped along the sand at Atlantic City.

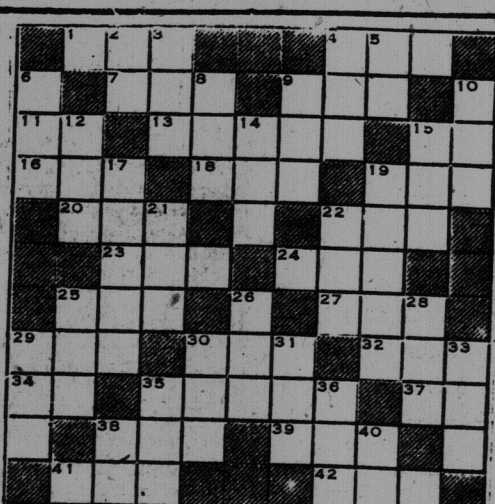

homeless little wrens and warblers and martins, so they will have some place to go when they come to visit.
If you haven't one near your house now, you'd better hustle and make one, so you had.
