In the quaint old town of Maldon, in Essex, England, stands St. Mary's Church, the oldest building of the kind in Essex. Outwardly scarcely more than a shell appears to remain of the original fabric, which is based upon what is generally accepted as a Saxon foundation. The chief exception is a still fine Norman tower, with buttresses at each corner, and a quaint out-of-place, comparatively modern steeple, that is almost grotesque in its inharmonious appearance. The remainder of the building is of red brick, and everywhere time has left deep imprints upon the workmanship and material. St. Mary's was one of the churches possessing the right of sanctuary, and its earliest charter, through the mother church in London, St. Martin-le-Grand, was granted by Ingelric in 1056. In another document the Earl Eustace, Count of Boulogne, expresses regret for the confiscation by him of the church's possession, and in 1070 wrote that he had "resolved to restore" certain lands, "to be held altogether free and undisturbed." Of the Norman portion the characteristic "chiselled" stones in many cases remain built into the buttresses, and some fragments of the Norman arch may still be traced on the north side of the existing arch. There is a still fine, although much mutilated, west door, and the tower, which fell early in the eighteenth century, was rebuilt about 1628. A rood staircase was exposed during more recent restorations, and is still left visible, as well as a lancet window in the tower.
