ON THE SPEED OF AUTOMOBILES.

Some one has said that the men who allow their automobiles to speed along at a break-neck pace are those who usually snore for two hours after dinner.

Mrs. Tucker says the slower the owner is in shouldering the responsibilities of citizenship, the greater is his desire to exceed the speed limit, when seated on a soft cushion in a two thousand dollar machine.

Mrs. Tucker used to boast that she knew all the aristocracy of the town, but now she's all at sea, and has come to the conclusion that the aristocrats who take charge of the town, and fly in autos have an appearance that is decidedly Eastern.

"Tho' I have strained my eyes," says Mrs. Tucker, "I fail to perceive any of the 'old stock' (that used to sail along behind a pair of spirited horses and a solemn-looking driver with a plug hat and the silver band), now kicking up a dust in one of those 'tearalls,' and the only conclusion I can come to is, that they stay at home to indulge in a good laugh."

What has become of the old fashioned rigs? We see none of them advertised to be auctioned at 11 o'clock, nor do we hear of them being put up on tender. The "old stock" seem to have retired from driving, and she doesn't wonder, but she'd like to know where that man is gone, who used to wear the drab-knickers and held the long whip stationary at an angle of forty-five degrees.

We miss him greatly in this town, for together with the horse police he lent an air of ancient grandeur that aroused in the common people a feeling of the highest respect for the older families. The people of to-day smile a smile of derision when you speak of such things, they laugh outright when you mention having respect for those in authority, but Mrs. Tucker clings to the idea that the people of her day had something to be thankful for, in their so-called childishness, they conscientiously felt that these people earned and deserved the respect which they showed them.

"The giddy flight of the automobile," says Mrs. Tucker, "coupled with the streamers which flow for yards from the heads of the feminine passengers, together with the frightened faces directly below the veils tend to convey the impression that the occupants of the car were fleeing from justice, or that some important function was on at the outlying settlement for which they are heading."

But if you follow them, if you could only arrive at the destination just as they haul in, you'll find all hands asleep and nothing to disturb the surrounding peacefulness except it be the distant bark of a woolly dog. The occupants that were in such hurry, are about the sheepiest looking lot ever you saw when the auto stops.

Mrs. Tucker says that in Montreal the speed limit is nine miles an hour, while on Topsail Road twenty nine is considered all right. Then we have autos striking this town those days as big as a blockhouse, and 'tis about time that we enquire about the size limit as well as the speed limit, or before we know where we are the man coming to town with a cart of fish, or the woman with a load of whorts will have to get off the earth to make room for this nuisance. Fining one of those fellows twenty five dollars for reckless driving is no good, as far as preventing an occurrence goes. What does the owner of a two thousand dollar machine care for twenty-five dollars? We'll be fining till the next thing we'll know that some one has met with a fatal accident, then we'll hold a post mortem and send a wreath to adorn the coffin and everything will go along gaily once more after a few days' wonder.

Six months making brooms in that quiet resort opposite the oil house, will take the sporting blood out of the giddiest of them, and if this penalty were made public, we'd have fewer nervous women trembling to death when they venture to use the country roads.
