Now with respect to its unsightliness, it is certainly not an ornament to the streets we have seen, but I must say if we were not looking for them I am sure we would never observe them. They are certainly not obtusive, and the people in both the cities we have been in say they never think of them. At a street corner where cars come from wires, sepecially where a turn is made, but they do not form nearly so unsightly a spectacle as the network of wires we now endure without a murmur. The unsightliness is a myth, and once the wires were strung up in our city we would never hear anything more about it.

Philadelphia possesses but little interest for us. It has neither troiley nor storage cars, the cable and horses being the two systems. However, this is the headquarters of the Washington storage cars, and we will have an interview with them to-morrow. We are told that there was formerly a storage battery car running in this city in Lehigh-avenue, but it has been withdrawn for some months.
