CHOICES

It seems to me that, though as members of the foreign service we are convinced that the power over changes in our lives is limited, we do have some important choices to make. Like all personal choices they require us to establish priorities and weigh the positive and negative effects of our actions.

Of course as spouses we may have to decide whether to accompany the employee on posting. The profound effect of this decision can't be overemphasized. In a time when it is becoming more and more clear that we really do become financially dependent (at our peril in case of separation or divorce), will the resulting physical separation become permanent? Perhaps more importantly, do we want it to? Is it possible to maintain a long-distance marriage? Or is the concern of contributing to an individual pension plan so we are not financially dependent in the future going to ensure permanent break-up now? If we take a leave of absence from the Public Service, will it be worthwhile to return when we have to pay back both segments of the pension contributions for the time we were away? Maybe it's easier to just go on the posting without even considering these choices!

If we do decide to be posted there are considerations that affect us personally and those around us. If the employee has duties that include entertaining and being entertained, do we choose to take part? Is there an adequate amount of pleasure involved in the process for us to be able to contribute without feeling resentful; does the pride that results from performing the tasks well outweigh the time, and expertise, required? Indeed, are we even interested in acquiring the expertise that may not come naturally? Does it matter; do we care? In fact, for many of us, the reason we take part is an entirely selfish one: we enjoy it! For others, it is a symbol of commitment to our husband or wife, and really has nothing to do with the government of Canada or the foreign service. It is simply part of the give and take of our marriages, and a private decision that enables us to meet new and interesting people no matter where we happen to live.

This is the time of year when many are making decisions that will affect their lives for the next few years, and in many cases coming to terms with the realities that will result. If you are one of them, we hope you have an understanding ear close by. Whatever your situation, consider joining the FSCA, an organization of people who are interested and who care
